

THE ETHICAL PHILOSOPHY OF THE GĪTĀ

BY

P. N. SRINIVASACHARI, M.A.

Retired Principal and Professor of Philosophy Pachayappa's College, Madras

SRI RAMAKRISHNA MATH
MYLAPORE MADRAS-4

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION

THE following lectures were delivered by me under the auspices of the University of Madras when I was Honorary Reader and I have now ventured to publish them in book form. An attempt is made in the chapters that follow to expound the ethical philosophy of the Gītā mainly in the light of Viśiṣṭādvaita by adopting western methods of critical enquiry. While the Upaniṣads enshrine the intuitions of Brahman and the Vedānta Sūtras establish their metaphysical basis, the Gītā brings out the essentials of the ethical religion of the Upaniṣads and dispels the misconception that Vedānta does not stress the moral values of experience. The metaphysic of morals as set forth in the Gītā and its philosophy of the self are developed in its first six chapters. The ethical religion of the Gītā is outlined in the next six chapters. In the last six chapters, the Divine Teacher sums up the Vedāntic religion of universal redemption and summons humanity heavily laden with ignorance, evil and sorrow to respond to the call of love and attain the eternal bliss of mukti.

I am indebted to Paṇḍit Kumāravāḍi Svāmin for explaining the Gītā to me as expounded by Rāmānuja and Vedānta Deśika. My thanks are due to the Madras University for having given me an opportunity to deliver these lectures and permitted me to publish them in book form. I am also deeply beholden to my friends Rao Saheb M. R. Rajagopala Aiyangar, Messrs. G. K. Rangaswami Aiyangar and K. R. Sarma and Dr. T. M. P. Mahadevan for the help rendered by them in correcting the proofs and offering valuable suggestions. I gladly acknowledge my obligations to Messrs. Thompson & Co., Ltd., for their prompt and elegant execution of the work in these difficult times.

SRI KRISHNA LIBRARY,
MYLAPORE,
1st July 1943.

P. N. SRINIVASACHARI

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION

THIS edition is revised and enlarged by the addition of the VII Chapter on "Puruṣottama Vidyā" and by the index to the whole volume. I owe the publication of this edition to the kindness of Sri Rajah Ravu Venkata Kumara Mahipathi Surya Rau Bahādur, D.Litt., Rajah of Pithapuram, and I am thankful to him for his deep interest in the production of my works.

Vedānta to-day is, as was mentioned in a previous work, overweighted on the side of Advaita and it is necessary in the interests of Advaita itself and the comparative study of Vedānta that the other side as represented chiefly by Viśiṣṭādvaita should be known and the balance thus restored. This object is sought to be realised in some humble measure by the publication of the Sri Krishna Library Series and other works by the author in a comprehensive way in the light of the critical methods of Western Philosophy. The logical and metaphysical aspect is expounded in the works on The Wisdom of the Upaniṣads, The Philosophy of Bhedābheda, The Philosophy of Viśiṣṭādvaita and the forthcoming book on The Aspects of Advaita. Rāmānuja's Idea of the Finite Self brings out the psychology of Viśiṣṭādvaita based on metaphysics. The Philosophy of the Beautiful portrays its aesthetic side which has its unique value. The Synthetic View of Vedānta is an attempt at harmonising the Vedāntic systems. The religion of Viśiṣṭādvaita is summed up in The Ethical Philosophy of the Gītā which is the quintessence of Vedānta and Hinduism in general. The works conclude with the expression of the synthetic genius of Vedānta and its spiritual hospitality which strike the keynote of the Divine Song.

My thanks are due to Sri K. R. Appalachariar for his kindness in preparing the index and to the G. S. Press for their neat and expeditious printing.

SRI KRISHNA LIBRARY,	}	P. N. SRINIVASACHARI
MYLAPORE,
24th. January, 1948.

PREFACE TO THE THIRD EDITION

The book was out of print for sometime. The author, Professor P. N. Srinivasachari, who passed away in 1959, delegated the copyright of the third and succeeding editions of this book to Sri Ramakrishna Math, Madras, in 1957. So, we have pleasure in bringing out the third edition priced at half the previous rate so as to bring it within the means of the readers. We hope this edition will reach a wider reading public.

4th November 1966.

PUBLISHERS.

CONTENTS

	Page
I. Introductory	1
The Gītā as the ethical philosophy of Vedānta and Hinduism—The value of the study of the Gītā—Harmony of the ethical, spiritual and religious aspects of life.
II. The Gītā Approach to the Problem of Conduct	9
Five factors in conduct and five one-sided theories based thereon—The Gītā avoids the extremes of hedonism and rationalism.
III. The Psychology of Conduct according to the Gītā	36
The ethics of the empirical self based on psychology—The influence of the three guṇas on conduct—Six factors in the moral judgment.
IV. The Ethics of Niṣkāma Karma (Transition from Kāmya Karma to Niṣkāma Karma)	50
Sāṅkhya buddhi and vyavasāyātmikā buddhi—First formula of conduct—Freedom in action and not from action—The extremes of activism and asceticism avoided — Four classical examples — Arjuna to avoid the extremes of militarism and pacifism.

	Page
V. Transition from the Ethics of Niṣkāma Karma to the Philosophy of the Self or Atman	76
Ethics based on metaphysics—The ātman different from the bodily or empirical self—Self-realisation by jñāna yoga— Second formula of conduct—The four examples re-interpreted—Similarity of all jīvas—Service—Meaning of Kaivalya.
VI. Transition from the Philosophy of the Self to that of Religion	92
Spirituality based on religion—The ātman and the Paramātman—Brahman the Absolute as the God of Religion—The meaning of avatāra—The third formula of conduct—Work as worship of God— Freedom, human and divine, reconciled— The four examples re-interpreted—The jñānī as the highest seeker after God— God as the Saviour of all.
VII. Puruṣottama Vidyā : Pariṇāmic pro- cess of prakṛti—moral progress of puruṣa	111
Purpose of Puruṣottama : Soul-making— The extremes of materialism, moralism and monism avoided.

	Page
VIII. The Problem of Evil and its Solution	121
Three meanings of karma and evil distinguished—The dualism between karma and kṛpā solved by ethical religion—The Gītā, the Divine ‘Song’ and the ‘Sermon’ on the Mount—Mystic experience of God as love transfigures viśaya kāma into Bhagavat kāma.
IX. Spirituality and Service	136
The views of positivism, humanism, Buddhism and Jainism reviewed—The modern views of Gandhi, Tilak and Aurobindo Ghosh and the traditional Vedāntic views—The Viśiṣṭādvaitic view.
X. Conclusion	149
Critical estimate of the three formulae—Summary of the eighteen chapters—The Gītā as the gospel of universal love and redemption—Its influence on politics and sociology—Evils of individualism and communalism remedied—The spiritual hospitality of the Gītā.
Index	161

CHAPTER I

INTRODUCTORY

PHILOSOPHY is the pursuit of wisdom and includes the metaphysical enquiry into the nature of reality as a whole and the moral and spiritual endeavour to realise it. Thus understood, it is known as a darśana in Indian thought, especially in its Vedāntic aspect. The problem of Vedānta may be stated in terms of Western thought in the three forms: What can we know? What should we do? What may we hope for? The answers to these questions relate to what are familiarly known as tattva, hita and puruṣārtha or the metaphysical, moral and religious aspects of experience. We can know Brahman as the Supreme Ground of the cosmic order. We ought to acquire the moral and spiritual discipline that is essential to apprehend Brahman. Then we can realise Brahman as the highest goal of life and attain its eternal bliss. Thus the philosopher that knows Brahman as the logical highest realises the supreme goal as the ethical and intuitional highest. To him, metaphysics, morals and religion are intimately blended. The subject of analytic enquiry is also the object of integral intuition.

Reality and value coincide and there is no contradiction between what is thought, what is willed and what is felt. Vedānta is a philosophy of religion in which the Absolute of metaphysics is the God of ethical religion and it alone satisfies the highest needs of life. This truth is enshrined in the Upaniṣads, the Gītā and the Vedānta Sūtras, and though their teaching is identical, their starting points and methods are different. While the Upaniṣads stress the mystic or intuitional aspect of Vedānta, the Sūtras emphasize the metaphysical side and the Gītā insists on moral and spiritual purification. The Śruti and the Sūtras contain the eternal foundations of Vedānta, and the Gītā is the revelation of its Divine Founder. The first brings out the immediacy of Vedāntic intuition, the second expounds its logical consistency and the third is the crown of Vedānta, the fulfilment of all religions and the completion of all philosophy.

Though the Gītā is generally regarded as the highest exposition of the ethical religion of Hinduism, its central teaching is misunderstood by hostile critics and not duly appreciated even by its advocates. The hostile critic rejects it on the ground that its ethics favours ritualism, quietism and passivity, that its religion does not promote the faith in universal redemption and that its philosophy is a fusion of pantheism and theism ending in confusion. According to the higher historic criticism which claims to be unfettered by dogmatism, the author of the Gītā is not a historic person, but is the creation of the anthropomorphic tendency of the theistic mind which identifies Kṛṣṇa, a Kṣatriya, with Vāsudeva, the chief of the Sātvata clan, and deifies Kṛṣṇa Vāsudeva as Nārāyaṇa. There is no divinity in an avatāra. His body is composed of mortal elements manifesting themselves in an extraordinary way. Kṛṣṇa is only a model man, an exemplar and not one descended from Vaikuṇṭha. The concrete form of God is only a concession to ignorance and is not real. According to the allegoric view, the dialogue between Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna on the fundamentals of philosophy in the battle-field is impossible and therefore the battle should be interpreted symbolically as the moral warfare between good and evil in Kurukṣetra which is really the arena of the ātman. The Yoga theory regards Kurukṣetra as the body, the hundred cousins^{†a} the Pāṇḍavas as the hundred nāḍīs, Arjuna as the soul and Kṛṣṇa as the Yoges'vara who controls the mind. Others say that the Gītā is the teaching of the logos as different from Parabrahman and that nara or Arjuna has to know the cosmic law of karma, abandon the idea of nirvāṇa or mokṣa itself and work for universal welfare. Supernaturalism interprets the avatāra of Kṛṣṇa as the miraculous descent of God from Vaikuṇṭha in a critical period of cosmic history when there was a decay of righteousness, with a view to destroying the evil-doer and restoring the moral order. The absolutists say that the Gītā transforms the metaphysical idealism of the Upaniṣads into theism with a view to adapting idealism to the daily needs of man. Brahman, the Absolute of metaphysics, becomes or lapses into Puruṣottama, the God of religion. The Personal God is less real than the Absolute, though more useful. Some idealists think that the Gītā presents a picture of supreme activity and sublime quietness and that it describes the gradual ascent from the concrete to the abstract, from the mystic quest to the transcendental quiet. It is thus the gospel of knowledge adapted to activity.

Every philosophy has a right to be understood from its highest point of view by a sympathetic insight into its essentials as taught by its best expositors. Judged by this criterion, the condemnation of the Gītā by the hostile critic betrays prejudice and incapacity for disinterested criticism. The historic method has only an empirical value in the world of space and time and cannot apply to transcendental spiritual truth. To doubt the authorship of the Gītā and its authenticity is to distrust the religious idea of God seeking man in his critical moments to save him from his distress. The Gītā deals with eternal truth immanent in the temporal series and the historicity of the Gītā really refers to philosophy taught through examples. To explain the Gītā as an allegory is to explain it away as a mere symbolic abstraction devoid of moral and spiritual content. The Yoga theory is equally futile as it leads to subjectivism and quietism. The absolutist's distinction between two Brahman and between the non-dualism of the Upaniṣads, especially the Identity Philosophy of Yājñavalkya, and the theism of the Gītā and his evolutionary theory of the avatāras are opposed to the generally accepted view of the Vedāntic ācāryas that the three prasthānas, the Upaniṣads, the Sūtras and the Gītā, teach the same truth. The absolutist should either accept the integrity of the prasthānas or reject them in toto giving up the attitude of condescension and compromise. The view of naive theism that the incarnational motive is the establishment of cosmic righteousness by eliminating the evil-doer should be reinterpreted in the language of the religion of universal redemption. The law of righteousness is rooted in redemptive love and the object of 'divine descent into history is not merely the redemption of the wicked man from his career of sin but is, even to a greater degree, communion with the jñānī or mystic who pines away owing to the agony of separation from his Other.* The Infinite enters into the human form in order to satisfy its soul-hunger and infinitise the self and satisfy its God-hunger.

✓ The Gītā is difficult to understand though it looks easy in its apparent simplicity. It is as simple as it is suggestive. It is a book for the layman and is a riddle to the philosopher. It is said to be the quintessence of all Vedic knowledge, samasta vedārtha sāra saṅgraha bhūtam. A verse in praise of the Gītā runs as follows:—

sarvopaniṣado gāvaḥ
 dogdhā gopālanandanah |
 ✓ pārtho vatsas sudhīr bhoktā
 dugdham gītāmṛtam mahat ||

All the Upaniṣads are the cows; Kṛṣṇa the cow-herd boy, is the milkman; Arjuna is the calf; the milk is the Gītā and the wise man who drinks it enjoys eternal bliss. It is sarva s'āstra hṛdayam, the heart of all the s'āstras. Whatever is true, good and beautiful and has an eternal value is enshrined in it. In its universality it reveals God Himself. Every system of philosophy, ethics and religion has its own place and value in its synoptic survey. It is the rock of ages and, through the ages, it has brought solace and comfort to millions of aching hearts immersed in the ocean of samsāra and sin and inspired them with hope and infused them with courage.

In the Gītā, divinity speaks to humanity through nara, the representative of man. It is a priceless possession of mankind on account of its universal appeal to all persons, at all times and in all places. Its purpose is not the establishment of a siddhānta by the refutation of all other theories, but is the synthetic harmonisation of apparently contradictory views by bringing out their common or essential features. Each system is evaluated in the light of its central teaching and is made to contribute to the perfection of the whole. Its ethics is not speculative, but is broad-based on the psychology of human nature in all its aspects of cognition, conation and feeling. The ultimate problems of ethics are metaphysical as they deal with the reality of the moral order of the universe. The metaphysics of ethics has its full meaning only in the religious consciousness of the goodness of God and the possibility of every man attaining godliness as revealed in the Upaniṣads and as exemplified in the Itihāsas and the Purāṇas. Brahman or the Absolute of the Upaniṣads becomes the Infinite or Īśvara of the Purāṇas and incarnates into humanity in order that man may be uplifted and made divine. The Gītā sings the glory of God becoming man without losing His divinity, to enable man to ascend to his Home by the paths of Karma Yoga, Jñāna Yoga and Bhakti Yoga. The way in which the Yogas are blended together brings out the synoptic insight or all-inclusive character of the Gītā. This truth is sought to be explained by various analogies which, however, are not quite sound. It is not an amalgam of isolated theories or merely a mechanical whole like a diadem set with precious stones. Even the analogies drawn from geometry and physics like the radii of the circle and the several colours of white light do not reveal the organic unity of its teaching. The Bhagavad Gītā is, as the name implies, the divine song whose soul-stirring melody enables man to soar Godward on the wings of its harmony. The keynote of the whole work is the blending of the ethical, spiritual and religious aspects of life and forms the main theme of the present study.

CHAPTER II

THE GĪTĀ APPROACH TO THE PROBLEM OF CONDUCT

IN the history of ethical thought, both in the East and in the West, the problem of conduct has, in the main, been approached in two ways. One is the a' priori, and the other the a' posteriori, method. The first considers morality and formulates the principles of conduct from an absolute point of view and enunciates criteria of distinction between right and wrong which are formal and rigorous in the extreme. The second adopts empirical standards which are more realistic and less exacting. The difference between the two is that between the application of pure reason and that of mere sensibility to the determination of the good. In between these extremes are various intermediate types in which the one or the other of these factors predominates. In European thought we have, on the one side, the extreme rationalistic tradition of the Cynics, the Stoics, Plato, and the Schoolmen culminating in the rigorous Kantian ethics. On the other, we have the ethics of sensibility represented by the theories of Aristippus, Epicurus, Hobbes, Hume, Bentham and Mill. In the East, the Sāṅkhya, the Yoga and the Buddhist schools stand for the rationalistic tradition while the Cārvākas and the Pūrva Mīmāṃsakas represent the opposite schools of thought.

A proper understanding of the nature and purpose of human life will show that none of these extreme schools can be right; nor can the problem of conduct be satisfactorily solved by making an amalgam of these views in which one of the elements, reason or sensibility, is emphasized at the expense of the other. Human nature is not all sensibility, nor is it all reason. Sentience starts with the senses, but does not stop with them nor is it limited by them. It is transcended by life according to reason which subdues and harmonises the clamant and conflicting demands of sensibility and organises them in tune with a higher purpose. But reason itself is inadequate to meet and account for all the situations of human life and has to be transcended by spiritual standards which defy intellectual analysis. The contradictions of morality can be resolved only in the consecrated sphere of religion where the storms of ethical strife are stilled in the calm of a devout life of dedicated service.

The metaphysic of the ethics of the Gītā avoids the extremes of the rival schools of thought. It adopts neither the high a priori road of Kant cleared of everything that is empirical and emptied of all emotional content nor is it hedonistic in its attitude aiming at the attainment of mere pleasure. It recognises the world of sense and sensibility as furnishing the data of ethics. Ethical philosophy is the investigation of true moral, as opposed to mere rational, freedom; it should solve the conflict between reason and passion and it is sustained by a recognition of the possibility of attaining self-sovereignty. As distinguished from the exclusive methods of other schools of ethics, the Gītā approach to the problem of conduct is synthetic in character. According to the Gītā, states of moral life are stages in a continuous development which culminates in the realisation of the self in a state of kaivalya. Morality has its ultimate meaning in the faith that goodness is grounded in God and that He alone as the Puruṣottama who is suprapersonal, is the absolutely good and is the pattern of perfection. The apprehension of God as the ground and goal of goodness, an approximation to Him by an appropriate attitude governing the details of our daily life and conduct and the attainment of the supreme stage of the pure consciousness of the Perfect Self—these are the distinctive features of Gītā ethics. The ethical philosophy of the Gītā pictures both an ascent and a descent. It goes up from the empirical to the transcendental and comes down from the absolute stage of realisation of the Supreme Self to the practical concerns of every-day life. It traces the progression from the empirical ethics of kāmya karma to the metaphysical stage of niṣkāma karma, then through self-realisation or ātmāvalokana to the realisation of Puruṣottama. It takes us on from prakṛti to puruṣa and from puruṣa to Puruṣottama; from viśaya kāma to ātma kāma and ultimately to Bhagavat kāma.

Not only is the Gītā way an ascent from sensibility to spiritual perfection, it is also a deductive descent from the supra-personal to the personal and the rational. The lower life is partial and unsatisfying. The higher is the fulfilment of the lower and can alone explain it. The contradictions of kāmya karma on the level of sensibility are resolved in niṣkāma karma on the intellectual level. This again is transfigured into ātma kāma or the urge for the realisation of the self in the spiritual sphere and culminates in kainkarya or consecrated service to all living beings and to the Supreme Self that dwells within them. Thus the Gītā way traces the transition from the popular idea of conduct as the ethics of sensibility to the morals of niṣkāma karma arising from self-knowledge. Its final stage is that discerning faith which transforms every deed into an act of devotion to God. This ascent from sensibility to spirituality is the essential part of the ethics of the Gītā and symbolises at once moral freedom and moral fulfilment. The manas which is torn asunder and drawn adrift by the senses has to be controlled by buddhi which exerts a steadying influence and makes for true freedom based on self-determination. Self-determination presupposes a self which, in its turn, implies a Super-Self which is its source, sustenance and satisfaction.

A sensible system of morals should take account of the psychology of conduct. Even as psychology without ethics leads to mere behaviourism, so ethics without psychology will be quite formal and devoid of content. The Gītā analyses voluntary action into five factors: (1) adhiṣṭhāna, (2) kartā, (3) karaṇa, (4) ceṣṭā and (5) daiva.

adhiṣṭhānam tathā kartā

karaṇam ca pṛthagvidham |

vividhāś ca pṛthak ceṣṭāḥ

daivam caivātra pañcamam ||

—xviii. 14.

Every moral act is a five-membered conative process and involves the combined activity of these elements. The first is the body or the adhiṣṭhāna which is the complex of the elements. It is mahā-bhūtaśaṅghātarūpa and is known as the kṣetra or living temple of the Lord. The kartā is the finite self who is the doer of the karma. The karaṇa is constituted by the cognitive and the conative organs, the jñānendriyas and the karmendriyas, which provide the apparatus of voluntary action and the complex of the stimulus-response mechanism. Ceṣṭā refers to the varied activities of prāṇa sustaining the body and its functions. The last and most important factor is da or the Supreme Self who is also the Inner Self of the individual, the ultimate niyantā, the prime cause of all conduct, the pradhāna hetu and end of all endeavour.

The main source of defect in the several extreme schools of ethics is to be traced to the concentration on one or other of the first four of these elements to the subordination, and often to the exclusion, of the others and to their failure to recognise the last factor which is at once the ground and the goal of conduct. The synthetic character of the Gītā approach reveals itself in the fact that it takes note of all of them and fits them into a system which gives them all their proper place and function in an integrated moral life. Before proceeding to show how this is done, it will be useful to consider the several schools of ethics which have developed from an undue emphasis of one or other of the parts of the mechanism of conduct and expose their inadequacy to provide the ideal of moral life and the standard of moral criticism.

The first among these imperfect ethical theories is materialistic ethics. It is the ethics of sensibility associated with the Cārvāka school. It denies the distinction between the deha (body) and the ātman (soul). In fact, it asserts that there is no ātman which is separate from the body (dehātirikta). The ātman is a mere aggregate of the four elements and the so-called spiritual self is only a secretion of the brain like fermented sugar becoming intoxicating liquor. Personality is only a protoplasmic product. The summum bonum of life is the satisfaction of animal inclinations. Holding that perception is the only source of knowledge, the Cārvākas look upon a man who renounces worldly pleasures as a timid fool. To them the visible world is the only reality and the cause of things is to be found, not in anything apart from them, but in their own inherent nature. They sum up their teaching in the admonition :

While life remains, let a man live happily, let him feed on ghee even though he runs into debt.

In the sixteenth chapter of the Gītā, we have a scathing denunciation of the life of tāmasic selfishness recommended by the materialistic thinkers and asuras. In that chapter called the "Daivāsura-sampad Vibhāga Yoga," the Lord distinguishes the divine from the demoniac qualities and observes :

dambho darpo (a) bhimānaś ca
krodhaḥ pārūṣyam eva ca |

ajñānam cābhijātasya
pārtha sampadam āsurīm || —xvi.

pravṛttiṁ ca nivṛttiṁ ca
janā navidur āsurāḥ |
na śaucam nāpi cācāro
na satyam teṣu vidyate || —xvi.

asatyam apratiṣṭham te
jagad āhur anīśvaram |
aparaspasambhūtam
kimanyat kāmahaitukam || —xvi.

kāmam āśritya duṣpūram
dambhamānamadānvitāḥ |
mohād gṛhīva (a) sadgrāhān
pravartante (a) śucivratāḥ || —xvi.

Hypocrisy, arrogance, conceit, wrath, harshness and folly are demoniac qualities. Men with these qualities know the secret neither of action nor abstinence. They have no regard for purity or good conduct and do not care for truth. They do not believe that God created or sustains the world. To them all things are only lust-born. Enslaved by insatiable desires, possessed by vanity and conceit, they are the victims of delusion and foul motives. Everything in the world is mechanically explained by them and this āśura Vedānta has no place in the scheme for supernatural agencies. It implies the development of brute power and the deification of egoism. The āsuric man perfects the self-regarding instincts and those of pugnacity, sex, reproduction and jealousy. The whole world is, according to him, lust-born and lust-sustained and the summum bonum of life is an infinite multiplication of wants and the acquisition of maximum sensual pleasure.

The Cārvāka theory suggests some parallels in the types of egoistic hedonism in Western thought as represented by Aristippus, the Greek, Hobbes, the Englishman, and Nietzsche, the German. Hedonism is the theory that pleasure is or ought to be the only end and aim of human conduct. Pleasure is the only good and every one should secure at every moment as much pleasure as possible. This is the ethical hedonism of Aristippus, the founder of the Cyrenaic school. Epicurus recommended a life of pleasure as distinguished from moments of pleasure. To him pleasure meant freedom from pain and care. While Aristippus referred only to bodily pleasures, Epicurus included mental pleasures as well. Hobbes was a psychological hedonist who said that man seeks only pleasure which is his sole good. Bentham developed the theory of hedonistic utilitarianism and described a calculus of pleasures on the basis of each man counting for one and no man as more than one. J. S. Mill tried to improve upon Bentham's theory by recognizing qualitative differences among pleasures forgetting that thereby he was abandoning the fundamental hedonistic position. The pleasures of the senses are different not only in degree but in kind from the happiness of intellectual pursuits and the bliss of communion with nature. Nietzsche propounded the theory of the superman emphasizing the will to power and the desire to enslave others with all its egoistic implications.

The theory of egoistic hedonism, though attractive to the popular mind, cannot stand philosophical examination. It has been powerfully criticised both in the East and in the West and is not seriously held by thinking men. Arising from a wrong sensationalist psychology that all knowledge is reducible to sensations of the moment, it has developed into sensationalist ethics giving primacy to the feeling tone of these sensations. It makes man a creature of sensibility and renders reason the slave of passion. "Nature," said Bentham, "has placed man under the governance of pleasure and pain." The office of reason is to minister to the passions augmenting their hedonistic tone as much as possible. The theory forgets that the self is not the senses and that happiness is not the addition of sense-pleasures. Reason is not the slave of passion nor is it merely the regulative principle making an adjustment between pleasure and pain. It is sovereign in its own right. It enters into the content of conduct as its exponent. The pleasure-philosopher whose motto is pleasure for pleasure's sake con-finds the pleasure of choice with the choice of pleasure. Pleasure is the subjective feeling that anticipates or attends success. The pleasure of pursuit is not the pursuit of pleasure. The recognition of qualitative differences among pleasures points to the existence of a criterion of choice which knocks the bottom off the hedonistic position. The pleasure of a wise man is the same as that of the fool qua pleasure ; but, if the former is chosen in preference to the latter, it is not on account of its pleasure-content, but of a qualitative superiority. The distinction between animal pleasure, intellectual happiness and spiritual joy points to a criterion of conduct different from mere pleasure. If it is better to be a Socrates dissatisfied than a pig satisfied, that is because pleasure by itself has no value. The element of quality which is the ground of preference is an extra-hedonistic consideration. On a rigorous application of the pleasure theory, the passage from egoism to altruism would be impossible. Service and sacrifice and the other-regarding virtues have no place in life on the hedonistic hypothesis. It puts a premium upon selfishness, and the hedonistic calculus so beautifully simple in theory is absolutely unworkable in practice.

The Vedāntic philosopher recognises that the good is the pleasant, but that the pleasant is not always the good.* The aggregate of pleasures is not pleasure. The Gītā points out that it is the avyavasāyātmikā buddhi which goes in search of the manifold of material pleasures as opposed to the eternal bliss of Brahman. The former are alpa and asthira, trivial and transient. Metaphysically speaking, hedonism identifies personality with sensibility and gives an empirical view of conduct. The sensualist follows the propensities of his nature and gratifies his cravings and appetite. The moral man is naturalised. But this is opposed to the Gītā idea of human nature ; for man is not the product of prakṛti. The whole difficulty in the hedonistic position arises from a wrong understanding of the place of sensibility in moral life. Sensibility furnishes the material of moral life but is not its mainstay. It is the datum which furnishes the content of conduct ; but it is by no means the criterion of conduct.

The Pūrva Mīmāṃsā theory of ethics traces the distinction of right and wrong to Vedic injunctions. The Vedas furnish a list of prescriptions and prohibitions (vidhi and niṣedha) and also explain the results that accrue from following the former and desisting from the latter. The Mīmāṃsā view of morality is only a specialised form of hedonism, as the practice of dharma and the avoidance of adharma are intended to secure merely happiness in life here and a state of felicitous existence in life after death in worlds other than this. The second chapter of the Gītā criticises this view of the basis of moral obligation in the following verses :

yāmimām puṣpitām vācam
pravadantyavipaścitaḥ |
vedavādaratāḥ pārtha
nānyad astīti vādinaḥ ||

kāmātmānas svargaparāḥ
janmakarmaphalapradām |
kriyāviśeṣabahulām
bhogaiśvaryagatim prati ||

bhogaiśvaryaprasaktānām
tayāpahṛta cetasām |
vyavasāyātmikā buddhiḥ
samādhau na vidhīyate ||

traiguṇya viṣayā vedāḥ
nistraiguṇyo bhavārjuna |
nirdvando nityasattvastho
niryogakṣema ātmavān ||

—ii. 42 to 45.

The Mīmāṃsaka extols the Veda as a body of eternal, impersonal and absolute truths dealing with dharma and adharma. By literally obeying the Vedic imperatives, the votary propitiates the gods, obtains earthly benefits of various kinds, power, prosperity and progeny here and the pleasures of svarga hereafter. The insistence on rites and rituals, which is the main part of the Mīmāṃsā theory of conduct, leads to sacerdotalism which, while preserving the husk of morality, misses the grain. As the Gītā observes, foolish persons rejoicing in the letter of the Vedas indulge in flowery speech. These persons are kāmāt-mānaḥ (seekers of pleasure), svargaparāḥ (desirous of entering svarga) and spend their time in the performance of ceremonials with a view to attaining pleasure and power. The code of conduct that is prescribed in the Vedas becomes formal and conventional, and escape from conflicting situations is sought in casuistry and text-torture. A pleasure-seeker can never be actuated by reason nor can he develop a contemplative attitude.

On the ritualistic theory, gods and men enter into a compact with each other, the men propitiating the gods with their sacrifices and the gods, in their turn, conferring on men manifold material benefits.* This idea of holding commerce with the gods, who after all seem to use men as their tools, and not as ends in themselves, is repugnant to the moral consciousness. The pleasures of sensibility even in the celestial worlds are paltry and perishing, and men have to come back to the earth when their stock of merit is exhausted; even Brahmā is subject to this fate.* But, the bliss of Brahman has eternal value and does not admit of arithmetical calculation. While the Vedic good has only a limited value being inferior in quality and duration; the Vedāntic good, which alone should be the object of ethical endeavour, has a pre-eminence invested with eternal values. Whoever allows himself to be deluded by the glittering fruits of sacrifice will be decoyed from the high moral road leading to self-realisation. The seeker after the highest sifts from the Veda what is relevant to his spiritual needs just as the thirsty traveller drinks from the tank only as much water as would quench his thirst :

yāvān artha udapāne
sarvatas samplutodake |
tāvān sarveṣu vedeṣu
brāhmaṇasya vijānataḥ ||

—ii. 46.

Vedic ceremonialism involves the endless activity of the guṇas, sattva, rajas and tamas, which, so long as they function, obstruct stead-fastness, purity and self-possession. The man who aspires for self-realisation should free himself from the sway of the guṇas and should be nistraiguṇyaḥ. But such a consummation is delayed or defeated by the practice of a mere conformist ritualistic religion which, by its dualism of merit and demerit, puṇya and pāpa, whirls man into the unending cycle of samsāra.

Even as an exclusive emphasis on the element of adhiṣṭhāna among the constituents of voluntary action leads to the extreme forms of materialistic and egoistic hedonism of the Cārvākas and the Vedavādins, the tendency to formulate a view of morality on the basis of the function of ceṣṭā (activity) comprehending the pañca prāṇas leads to what may be called the ethics of vitalism. The vital airs constitute the sine qua non of life-activity; for, without them, the other organs of the body would lose their potency and power. Spiritual excellence is impossible without bodily efficiency. The practice of subjecting oneself to severe austerities and doing penance with a view to acquiring ethical and religious merit does not conduce to the health of the soul. This has only the effect of tormenting the body and does violence to the deity enshrined in it. Having no s'āstraic sanction, all this is motivated by vanity and egoism.

As the Gītā observes :

aśāstravihitam ghoram
 tapyante ye tapo janāḥ |
 dambhāhaṅkārasamyuktāḥ
 kāmarāgabalanvitāḥ ||
 karśayantaś śarīrastham
 bhūtagrāmam acetasaḥ |
 mām caivāntaś śarīrastham
 tām viddhyāsuraniścayān ||

—xvii. 5 & 6.

On the hypothesis that spiritual excellence is impossible without mental efficiency and steadfastness and that this cannot be secured in the absence of physical fitness, the ethics of vitalism proceeds to distinguish various kinds of food and their effect on human nature. For the support of life and the maintenance of the body, food is necessary. This food is of a three-fold nature, sāttvika, rājasa and tāmasa, and generates the corresponding qualities in the person who eats it. Of these, ~~the~~ sāttvika is “dear to the pure” and is to be preferred to the other two. It promotes life, energy and vigour, fills one with joy and is supremely delicious.

āyus sattvabalārogya —
 sukha prīti vivardhanāḥ |
 rasyās snigdhas sthirā hr̥dyāḥ
 āhārās sāttvikapriyāḥ ||

—xvii. 8.

The rājasa foods are bitter, hot and pungent, dry and burning and produce pain, grief and illness. The tāmasa foods are stale and flat, putrid and unclean and are "dear to the dark-minded".*

It is interesting in this connection to note a novel theory of prāṇaism according to which the Gītā is a manual of mind-cure analogous to the modern system of psycho-analysis. It is claimed that this interpretation would solve many of the problems of the Gītā till now enshrouded in mystery. The main problem of the Gītā is said to be how a diseased and disordered mind like that of Arjuna, suffering from a division of the conscious and the sub-conscious phases of the ego, can be restored to moral health by a supreme psycho-analyst like Kṛṣṇa. It is urged that the disorder in the mind is due to the habitual repression of the impulses from the outside and of the emotions of the mind. The accumulated and suppressed feeling shows itself in perspiration, palpitation, cardiac pains, tremor, fear and grief. Arjuna suffers, according to this view, from psycho-neurosis. The As'vattha tree is not a myth nor an allegory, but a real apparatus. According to this theory, the physical soul or kṣara puruṣa and the psychical soul or akṣara puruṣa, both shoot forth from the Absolute. The sub-conscious is the great "within", which is a vital part of the super-conscious. Kṛṣṇa is said to cure the disease of Arjuna's mind by directing it to the divine qualities of the psyche which constitute the divī sampat. The divine consciousness is then aroused and the mind is said to be cured. Then Arjuna exclaims "naṣṭo mohas smṛtir labdhā" ("My delusion is destroyed, I have now regained my memory"). Yet another interpretation of the Gītā from the point of view of vitalism is offered by another philosopher. He observes that prāṇa is the vitalising force embedded in the nervous system and the dynamics of active life may be traced to it. It is the cosmic energy that sustains the inanimate order and causes the evolution of life. It functions in the body and the vital organs and energises the manas and buddhi. It is not confined to the physiological functions. The quickening of desire is due to prāṇa. Sāttvika prāṇa is quieting and contributes to the conservation of energy. Rājasa prāṇa makes for force and fatigue. Prāṇa is not merely biological; like the elan vital of Bergson, it is also cosmic. Prāṇāyāma as a process of Yoga is a psycho-vital means for effecting the in-flow of cosmic life. The pulse of the Infinite vibrates through the suṣumnā nāḍi. The stir of prāṇa is due to will, and finite life becomes an instrument of Infinite Consciousness. Prāṇāyāma makes the body a medium for spiritual expression. It is neither the suppression nor the sublimation of animal life, but is its spiritual transformation by the infusion of cosmic prāṇa. When sensibility is thus controlled, it becomes a vehicle of spiritual life and even bodily life can be made immortal.

Any system of ethics which does not take into account all aspects of human nature is bound to be defective, being one-sided. Vitalistic ethics takes up the category of life and life-giving prāṇa and proceeds on the assumption that all those kinds of conduct that conduce to the maintenance and promotion of the forces of life and bodily health are alone ethically valuable. But the self of man is not exhausted by vital forces, and personality is more than prāṇa. The maintenance of bodily health is certainly necessary for living a full life in the true sense of the term; yet, it is not the sole criterion of conduct. The condition of right living is mistaken for its constituent and an exaggerated importance is attached to it. The biological approach to the problem of reality refers to a lower category and cannot exhaust its entire nature. Buddhi is a category higher than prāṇa and the rational element in man makes for his excellence in a more real sense than the mere vital element, and so biological ethics has to be transcended by rationalistic ethics.

Any acceptable theory of ethics must give an account of the moral ideal in conformity with the demands of reason. The history of ethical thought is the story of the conflict between the claims of sensibility and reason to determine the good, and the tendency to a large extent has been to gravitate towards rule by reason as opposed to the sway of sensibility. This opposition obtains in the life of man himself and conduct determined by the principle of reason is generally considered to be more meritorious and more in accord with the moral ideal. This is the main characteristic of the Buddhistic and Sāṅkhyan theories in India and the Stoic and Kantian views in the West. There has been a tendency to read Buddhistic influence in the Gītā ethics. The Gītā theory of rāga, dveṣa and moha explained in the twelfth chapter is examined and many similarities with Buddhistic ethics are traced. The five steps of nirvāṇa mentioned by the Gītā are the same as those of Buddhism. Buddhistic psychology regards the ātman as the aggregate or skandhas of the flesh and treats the belief in individuality as pure heresy. Buddhism ethicises the law of karma and divests it of its ceremonial aspect and insists on disinterested action. Even the love of humanity is from disinterested motives and is not prompted by sentiment. To the Buddhist, the summum bonum of life is the extinction of sense and sensibility and the attainment of nirvāṇa, and the way to it is contained in the gospel of the four noble truths: Evil is essentially the aching thirst for life and consequent suffering. The root cause of suffering is the aching thirst for life. The way to the extinction of sin and sorrow is the quenching of desire. This is attained by the eight-fold path consisting of (1) right belief, (2) right aim, (3) right word, (4) right action, (5) right living, (6) right endeavour, (7) right-mindedness and (8) right meditation. Nirvāṇa is progressive freedom from the ten fetters and ultimate cessation of individual existence.

While there are obvious similarities between the rationalistic element in the Gītā theory of morals and the ethical theory of the Buddhists, it is wrong to conclude therefrom that the Gītā was influenced by Buddhism. On the other hand, it is the Gītā itself that has influenced Mahāyāna Buddhism in its ethical aspects. The Gītā is more in conformity with the past than Buddhism and propounds a positive metaphysic of morals. The Gītā employs the concept of Brahmanirvāṇa in the place of the purely negative ideal of Buddhistic nirvāṇa.

It is held by some writers that the Gītā theory of morals is based on Sāṅkhyan ethics. Garbe says: "The teachings of Sāṅkhya Yoga constitute almost entirely the foundation of the philosophical observations of the Bhagavad Gītā. Sāṅkhya is often mentioned by name, while the Vedānta appears only once (vedāntakṛt, xv. 15) and then in the sense of Upaniṣad or treatise. Accordingly, when we think merely of the role which the philosophical systems play in the Gītā as it has been handed down to us, and when we consider the irreconcilable contradictions between the Sāṅkhya Yoga and the Vedānta, the Vedāntic constituents of the Bhagavad Gītā prove not to belong to the original poem." There is a fundamental difference between the Gītā approach to the problem of conduct and that of the Sāṅkhya. The Sāṅkhya is interested in the analysis of the self and its theory of Yoga does not involve any synthetic union. Its aim is isolation and not integration. Puruṣa is the silent seer, but he sees nothing. He is pure consciousness, but, owing to his reflection in buddhi which is an evolute of prakṛti, he appears to have cognition, conation and feeling. Prakṛti is constituted by the three guṇas of intelligence (prakāśa), energy (pravṛtti) and slothfulness (moha), whose interaction disturbs the deluded puruṣa. The moment he withdraws from the cosmic scene, he attains kaivalya; he ceases to give his consent to all the coquetry of prakṛti. Then, the ego-sense is destroyed and the obsession ceases. The Gītā accepts the Sāṅkhya analysis of conduct, but gives its own meaning of prakṛti and puruṣa and reconciles theism, pantheism and monism. The Sāṅkhya

mentioned in the Gītā is not the Sāṅkhya system but a process of rational discrimination of the self and the Yoga is Karma Yoga. Sāṅkhya is the vision of the right and the good and Yoga is the way and the principle as embodied in practice. It is at once the theory and practice of conduct. The Sāṅkhyan ethics leads to passivity and saṅnyāsa or entire renunciation of action. But the Gītā theory makes the jīva morally free as it is the subject of moral judgment having cognition, conation and feeling.

The Upaniṣad speaks of two puruṣas as two birds on the same tree "where the one tastes the fruits of life, and the other, not tasting, looks on".* There are three different puruṣas recognisable in the Gītā; the kṣara or mutable in nature, the puruṣa embodied in prakṛti; the akṣara or immutable puruṣa, the silent self freed from prakṛti; and the uttama puruṣa or Supreme Lord. This is said to be the uttama rahasya (supreme secret) of the Gītā.†

The Buddhistic and Sāṅkhyan rationalistic theories outlined above have some affinity with Stoic and Kantian views of morality. According to the Stoics, ethics is built on physics; what man ought to do is derived from what he is. Virtue is the supreme good and the wise man alone is happy. The Stoic rule of life is to live consistently with nature. The Stoic formula is to live according to the scientific knowledge of the phenomena¹ of nature, doing nothing which the universal law forbids. Animals follow the laws of nature, namely, self-preservation and race-propagation and man follows his rational nature. The important Stoic virtues are courage, wisdom, justice and temperance and the corresponding vices are fear, discontent, greed and elation.

Riches I hold in light esteem,
And Love I laugh to scorn :
And lust of fame was but a dream,
That vanished with the morn.
And if I pray, the only prayer
That moves my lips for me
Is, "Leave the heart that now I bear,
And give me liberty !"
Yes, as my swift days near their goal,
'Tis all that I implore ;
In life and death a chainless soul,
With courage to endure. —E. BRONTE.

Cloistered virtue is a form of cowardice. Later Stoicism included softer feelings. While it rejects the stormy state of the soul, it admits that the soul is like the surging sea and not an ice-bound lake. According to the Stoic ethics, the outward looking point of view is abandoned and introspection takes the place of impulsive action. This insight reveals to us an inner authority. The hedonist refers to externality and reduces virtue to mere expediency or prudence. The Stoic insists on being good rather than on doing good.

Christian asceticism as reflected in the monastic ideal of the middle ages had much in common with the Buddhistic way of life and it insisted on the conquest of the sensuous nature of man and the strict adherence to canonical law as the ruling principle of conduct. Leading a life of celibacy in cloistered seclusion, the men of religion withdrew from the world and subjected themselves to privations of all kinds and spent their days in penance and penitence. Their ethics was based on the idea that the starvation of the senses is necessary for the culture of the soul. It was an one-sided development of personality which did not do justice to all aspects of human nature. The extreme rationalism of Kant was also characterised by the formalism and rigour associated with Christian asceticism. Kant was largely influenced by the Stoic view of life and he also insisted on the elimination of sensibility and on the ordering of life according to the dictates of reason. We shall consider later the similarities and differences between the Gītā ethics and the Kantian and shall point out in what respects the former is more satisfactory. Meanwhile, we may observe that the Kantian view of morality is as extreme on the rationalistic side as the hedonistic view is on the empirical side and falls short of the synthetic ideal presented by the Gītā.

Thus, the moral ideal has been portrayed in various ways by the several schools of ethics both in the East and in the West. They may be called the materialistic, the vitalistic, the rationalistic and the ascetic theories of morality. Each of them, as we have seen, concentrates on one of the factors constituting the dynamism of conduct to the exclusion or subordination of the others and, being thus based on a partial view of human nature, is, therefore, defective and unsatisfactory. Sensuous pleasure, physical health and efficiency, rational determination or rigorous asceticism which starves the senses, none of these can exhaust the moral ideal and provide a way out of the contradictions of life. Each of these has to be transcended by the next in the series to which it has to give place in the development of the moral man. And, more than all these is the part played by daivam in the evolution of conduct, the fact of divine determination within the ambit of human freedom. It is this synthesis between the human and the divine, the insistence on the recognition of the fact that "our wills are ours to make them Thine" that invests the Gītā theory of morality with a completeness which is lacking in the partial one-sided views that we have so far considered.

CHAPTER III

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF CONDUCT ACCORDING TO THE GĪTĀ

ETHICS is closely related to psychology, metaphysics and religion. 'What can I know?' is the problem of metaphysics. 'What ought I to do?' is the problem of morality. 'What may I become?' determines the religious quest. The answer to these three questions should have a psychological foundation and one should properly understand the nature of the 'I' that is to know, to do and to become. The kinds of knowledge and experience with which these subjects deal are inter-related though they can be analysed and distinguished logically for the purpose of specialised study. For the formulation of a satisfactory system of ethics, we should start with certain psychological prolegomena giving an account of the nature of the self that acts and the essential constituents of voluntary action. That is a procedure common alike to Eastern and to Western systems of ethics. Generally speaking, it will be found that the main cause of an unsatisfactory ethical theory is a wrong psychology.

From the ethical point of view, the self or ātman is considered as a moral self or kartā with freedom as its essential quality but acted upon by the influences of prakṛti and its three guṇas. Vedāntic ethics distinguishes between the ātman which is a pure spiritual entity and the empirical self or kṣetrajña which owing to its avidyā identifies itself with the kṣetra composed of prakṛti, ahankāra, mahat and the mahābhūtas. The ātman is not a bye-product of matter or prakṛti or a psychophysical series or saṅghāta nor even the synthetic unity of apperception, but is an eternal self-luminous spiritual entity distinct from the twenty-four categories of prakṛti and the sthūla and the sūkṣma śarīras. The several indriyas, the organs of knowing and doing, pertain to the body. The existence of the ātman as puruṣa is proved by direct experience and not by means of pratyakṣa (perception) and anumāna (inference). The ātman abides in its being as a self-conscious entity and such self-cognition presupposes the distinction between the self and its attributive consciousness. Prakṛti is a fleeting flux due to its pariṇāmic process and it consists of the five elements, the five cognitive and the five conative senses with the antaḥkaraṇa as the sense-commune and the five tanmātras. The sūkṣma śarīra is the subtle psychic continuum in which the experiences of the moral self in its begin-ningless career are conserved. Consciousness consists of different strata including what is distinctly given, what is dimly given and what is implied. It shades off into the sub-conscious and the unconscious and the three form the psycho-physical continuum of the moral consciousness. The psychology of the moral self thus deals with the empirical self which is caught up in the confusions of avidyā and subjects itself to the vicissitudes of karma.

Though the jīva is essentially free, its moral life is largely influenced by its character, mental content and heritage in the long course of its evolution. As Browning says, we should, in forming a moral estimate of a person, take into account all his fancies and thoughts, all immature instincts and unsure purposes. The mind is not a collection of perceptions, feelings and ideas, but a psycho-physical continuum. The moral self lives in a world of will which includes not only the momentary distinct will occupying the focus of attention, but also the dim will and the implied purpose of the whole life. It contains the three aspects of cognition, conation and feeling and also the ancient samskāras and vāsanās which are imbedded in the impulses, instincts and dispositions making up the subtle body. Volition is ideomotor action involving the two stages of deliberation and decision.

Psychology is closely related to physiology and the study of volition includes, in the larger sense, reflex action and semi-voluntary and random movements. Reflex action is a response to stimulus without the intervention of consciousness. Instinct is an inherited psycho-physical disposition issuing in cognition, conation and feeling. Impulse is the consciousness of the tendency to movement, but is not deliberate action. Mood is a higher stage and is described as a predisposition to certain specific forces of emotion and is different from temperament which is a more persistent form of tendency. William James analyses five steps in the development of the will. At first there is an easy transition from drift to certainty in a direction determined from outside. In the second stage, we drift with the conviction that things will turn out right in the end. In the third stage, the determination comes from within. In men with strong emotions of the world-shaking type, there is a sudden outburst of pent-up passion passing from the easy to the strenuous mood. In the fifth and final stage of decision, there is a feeling of inward effort. Every desire implies an idea of an end and therefore involves cognition, conation and feeling. Where there is a conflict of desires, we deliberate on the alternative courses of action and there is a mental see-saw. Finally, when the moral self identifies itself with the desired end, deliberation leads to decision. When the action is repeated, a beaten pathway is laid. Then action becomes secondary and automatic and is, as it were, second nature.

The central idea in the Vedāntic psychology of the moral self is the theory of karma and rebirth. It involves the operation of the law of causation on the moral level. The moral judgment is passed not merely on the doer or kartā nor only on the deed or karma, but also on the doer doing the deed. Every act is causally determined by its antecedent, and determines its effect. The present is the child of the past and the parent of the future. The moral freedom of the self presupposes its immortality and eternity and when the gross body is dissolved at death, the self, with its sūkṣma śarīra or subtle body in which every karma done in its moral adventure in the past is conserved, is born again in a new environment suited to its moral development. In this way, life and death form a cycle like day and night or the seed and the tree. Though, from the scientific point of view, every moral act may be explained in terms of cause and effect, from the ethical point of view every karma presupposes a kartā or moral agent who has the freedom to shape his destiny. The moral self can attain self-sovereignty and rise to the status of Brahman or sink into slavery and lapse to the level of the brute. The ātman is by nature eternal and blissful; but, owing to some ancient confusion (anādi karmarūpa avidyā), which cannot be causally analysed, it mistakes itself for prakṛti, becomes a mode of matter, subjects itself to the hazards of metempsychosis and the wheel of karma on the sub-human, human and celestial levels and thus virtually forgets its birth-right of spiritual sovereignty and stability. There are, however, degrees in the contractions and expansions of the spiritual consciousness due to differences in the working of karma. Psychologists classify kama-ridden jīvas into different types according to the relative preponderance of temperamental differences. The mediaeval classification of temperaments into the mercurial, phlegmatic, melancholy and sanguine humours does not admit of scientific proof. According to James, the will may be healthy, precipitate or perverse. When the vision is right and the action obeys the vision, the will is healthy or normal. It is unhealthy when it is precipitate or perverse. In the former case, action follows the stimulus rapidly. The perverse type may be the obstructive or the explosive will. The latter is the result of the mercurial temperament with impulsive motor energy. In the former case, the will is blocked by an unduly long period of deliberation and hesitancy.

The Gītā psychology of ethics is based on the distinctions of the three guṇas, sattva, rajas and tamas, and their interaction. Our desires and dispositions, moods and temperaments, actions and tendencies, feelings and emotions are all to be traced to the influence of these guṇas and to their varying preponderance in human nature.

sattvam rajas tama iti
 guṇāḥ prakṛtisambhavāḥ |
 nibadhnanti mahābāho
 dehe dehinam avyayam ||

—xiv. 5.

Each dehī has his own svabhāva or asādhāraṇa bhāva (characteristic nature) determined by his inherited dispositions.

na tad asti prthivyām vā
 divi deveṣu vā punaḥ |
 sattvam prakṛtijair muktaṁ
 yad ebhis syāt tribhīr guṇaiḥ ||

—xviii. 40.

No jīva. whether in terrestrial or in celestial abodes, is exempt from the influences of the guṇas of prakṛti. The guṇas are interdependent and not independent, though they have their own specific mental tendencies or psycho-physical functions. The essential nature of sattva, rajas and tamas may be summed up respectively in the three words, prakāśa, pravṛtti, and ālasya which may be translated roughly as serenity, restlessness and slothfulness. Sattva illumines the intellect, harmonises conflicting desires and thus conduces to happiness. Clear and distinct ideas lead to virtue and health of mind. Aristotle says that virtue is determined by reason. Rajas is restless activity that seeks pleasure in domination, display and sex gratification. It is rājasa vitality that goads the self to adventures and endless multiplication of wants. It is the itching for works.

rajo rāgātmakam viddhi
 tasmāśaṅgasamudbhavam |
 tan nibadhnāti kaunteya
 karmasaṅgena dehinam ||

—xiv. 7.

When the self is beclouded by tamas, its thought is confused, the will is perverted and it sinks into slothfulness. Tāmasa sluggishness is steeped in ignorance and its engrossing darkness and manifests itself as soporific repose.

tamastvajñānājam viddhi
 mohanam sarvadehinām |
 pramādālasyanidrābhiḥ
 tan nibadhnāti bhārata ||

—xiv. 8.

While sattva makes for the illumination of intelligence (prakāśa), rajas, connotes pravṛtti or restless activity and kāma or lusts of the flesh and tamas implies ignorance (moha) and inertia (xiv. 22). Sattva lights the upward path to perfection. Rajas is the restless longing for the pleasures of svarga, and it imprisons the self in the

see-saw of samsāra. The tāmasa self is hurled down into the most primitive stages of life like the worm. Thus the mingling of the three guṇas in varying degrees of preponderance constitutes the driving force of human conduct and helps or hinders moral endeavour and spiritual progress. While the activity of the guṇas has a constraining and determining influence on our nature, it is open to us to acquire the one or the other of them in an increasing measure. In this lies the essence of human freedom which is the basis of ethical life.

The psychology of the jīva as dehī conjoined with the theory of the guṇas is closely related to physiology. The guṇas are influenced by the food that maintains the organism. The nature of the food reacts on the mind and moulds its character. As the *Upaniṣad points out, it is the purity of the food which a person takes that purifies the mind and makes it sāttvika. It is the healthy sāttvika mind that makes for morality and fosters spirituality. Sāttvika food is delicious and nourishing and conduces to the health of the body, longevity of life and the development of the intellect or jñāna. Rājasa food is bitter, sour, pungent and saline and it creates restlessness and mental instability and is the cause of the worries of life. Tāmāsa guṇa is caused by putrid, intoxicating and unclean

* āhara suddhau sattva suddhih. Ch. Up., VII, xxvi 2

food.* Seeing that right action can flow only from a pure spirit characterised by sāttvika nature, it is our duty to avoid all those kinds of food which will lead to the development of rājasa and tāmasa qualities and eat only such as will contribute to the promotion of sāttvika qualities. The man who does not follow this rule, abuses his freedom and becomes degenerate.

In every moral judgment, there are six factors, viz., the subject, the object, knowledge, discrimination, determination and satisfaction (kartā, jñeya, jñāna, buddhi, dhṛti and sukha). These aspects correspond generally to the western analysis of the mental process into cognition, conation and feeling. Every moral action involves the mental apprehension of the good and its appreciation and adoption in actual conduct. Merely knowing the good without feeling an urge to realise it and without an endeavour in that direction is of no value. Intellectual assent is a necessary preliminary to the moral process, but does not exhaust it. A yearning for ethical perfection without the guidance of a discriminating mind is no better than blind impulse groping in the dark without proper guidance. Doing good without a knowledge of its nature and without an engrossing eagerness for it reduces moral life to a mechanical process and man becomes an automaton. Each of the six factors enumerated above is influenced by the three guṇas and determines one's moral disposition. The Gītā in the seventeenth and eighteenth chapters gives an elaborate analysis of the sway of the guṇas in all the minute details of moral life and it may be briefly summarised here.

When the subject of the moral judgment (kartā) is determined to action by the sattva guṇa, he is free from egoism (anahamvādī) and utilitarian motives and his serenity is never affected by success or failure. The rājasa is the rāgī seized by the restless desire for the objects of sense and he calculates more on the consequences of duty than on its intrinsic worth. The tāmasa lacks decision. He drifts and procrastinates and does his work in a stupid, stubborn and mechanical way (xviii. 26—28). Sāttvika consciousness or jñāna is the right perspective which consists in discerning the ātman as the underlying unity of all living beings. Āīman is the one spiritual self that is the background of the empirical 'me'. When the mind delights in knowing multiplicity and division and not unity, it is rājasa consciousness. Tāmasa knowledge is the crude and narrow faith in polytheism and animism, and the worship of ghosts and malignant spirits. The object of a moral judgment is the ought (kartavya karma). In its sāttvika aspect, conduct is freedom from egoism and love of extrinsic values. Egoism or self-love is the rājasa side and the tāmasa act is impelled by instinct and inclination (xviii. 23—25). Sāttvika buddhi is decision after deliberation and therefore implies intellectual assent as well as volitional consent. Buddhi is the moral consciousness of what is right or wrong, good or bad, and it alone distinguishes man from the lower animals. It becomes rājasa when, instead of being a disinterested love of truth and virtue, it is influenced by prejudice and gets distorted and distracted. Tāmasa understanding consists in mistaken knowledge and perversity. Buddhi influenced by the three kinds of guṇa produces respectively yathārtha jñāna or niścaya (knowledge which is true to fact), ayathārtha jñāna (knowledge which is not true to fact), and viparīta jñāna (knowledge which is the opposite of truth) (xviii. 29—31). The fifth factor is dhṛti or determination, functioning through manas, prāṇa and the indriyas. Sāttvika determination is the habit of concentration on the ultimate nature of life, which is so essential to the attainment of mukti. The rājasa will is interested only in the market or economic values, of virtue (phalākāṅkṣā) and not in its absolute value. The tāmasa will is the victim of fear and misery (xviii. 33—35). Lastly, when desire is realised, there is self-satisfaction. On the sāttvika level, virtue is an ever-enduring joy. The practice of virtue is bitter in the beginning and blissful in the end. Rājasa sukha is the reverse of the sāttvika state as it results from a life of restless adventure. It begins with thrills and ends in disappointments. The seductive pleasures of the senses are sweet like nectar in the beginning, but in the end are harmful like poison. Viṣaya sukha (the pleasure of the senses) ultimately turns out to be viṣa or poison in effect. While poison produces physical death, the lusts of the flesh cause moral atrophy and spiritual extinction. Tāmasa sukha is the pleasure of somnolence. Instead of spiritual joy, there is spirituous intoxication (xviii. 37-39).

The psychological analysis of these factors has an ethical significance. The ethical value of conduct is more important than its psychological content and it consists in the progression from the lowest grade of tamas to the highest stage of sattva. The kṣetra in which the jīva lives forms a suitable environment for the evolving self and it is by contact with it that the ātman as kṣetrajña experiences the pleasures and pains of bodily life and finally seeks mokṣa. Prakṛti and puruṣa are different, as prakṛti is jaḍa or inert being subject to the natural law or the pariṇāmic process and puruṣa is a self-luminous entity subjecting itself to the moral law of karma. The contact between the two resulting in the sorrows of samsāra is anādi (without beginning) and so cannot be causally explained. But there is an end to the bondage of karma and then the jīva is freed from its subjection to prakṛti and its guṇas. By means of viveka (discriminating intelligence) the kṣetrajña is released from the contact with the kṣetra.

CHAPTER IV

THE ETHICS OF NIṢKĀMA KARMA

(Transition from Kāmya Karma to Niṣkāma Karma)

BY far the most distinctive contribution of the Bhagavad Gītā to ethical thought is the idea of niṣkāma karma which is as unique in conception as it is perfect in its synthesis of the opposing aspects of moral life. The only other theory comparable to it is the categorical imperative of Kant ; but noble and grand as it is, the German philosopher's moral prescription fails to do justice to all the factors of the ethical situation. Its rigorous formalism and relentless suppression of sensibility make it at once impossible and unacceptable. The Gītā theory of disinterested work is based on a synthetic view of human nature and harmonises its contradictions ; it does not suppress the senses and their activities, but sublimates them to spiritual purposes. The senses are spiritualised, and karma is transformed into kainkarya. There are certain points of similarity between the theories of the Gītā and of Kant which are very instructive. Both of them imply the primacy of practical reason and the superiority of the moral values of life to the material. But the Kantian antithesis between ethics and metaphysics finds no counterpart in the Gītā. Far from morality being opposed to the metaphysical or religious quest, it is in fact contributory and is a necessary preliminary to a rich and fully developed spiritual life. The Gītā theory of morals is based on a rational insight into the true nature of human personality and is intended to lead to the discovery and enrichment of that personality. The way of niṣkāma karma prescribed by the Gītā is based on a view of life characteristic of a rational metaphysics and points to, and paves the way for, a divine life drawing man closer and closer to itself, until he becomes full of it and ultimately one with it. Grounded on a metaphysical attitude, moral activity is intended to secure religious attainment.

The theory of niṣkāma karma is based on the fundamental fact of the universality of karma. Psychology speaks of two dissimilar types of mind, the active and the ascetic. Voluntaristic ethics addresses itself to the reality of a dynamic ordering of nature as illustrated in the flux of phenomena and it furnishes the apparatus of moral achievement. Every thought, act or word is an effect of karma, whether it is sensory-motor or ideo-motor. Morality implies activity which is at once the birth-right and the inescapable duty of man.

na hi kaścit kṣaṇam api
 jātu tiṣṭhatyakarmakṛt |
 kār্যate hyavaśaḥ karma
 sarvaḥ prakṛtijairguṇaiḥ |

—iii. 5.

No man can remain still even for a moment without doing some work. Every one is made to act, in spite of oneself, by the qualities of one's nature. Opposed to this is the recommendation to cease from all kinds of work, to live a life of sannyāsa or renunciation involving complete cessation from work. On this view, incessant activity involves endless work and worry and, if aspiration is not crowned with achievement, discontent and depression are inevitable. The contemplative ideal insists on the attainment of śānti or peace which is incompatible with the "fever and fret of life" associated with karma. The ascetic insists on introversion and extinction of desire as the sine qua non of securing eternal life (amṛtatvam). But the active man regards incessant work as the ideal of life. The Gītā, as we shall see more fully in the sequel, offers a synthesis of these two ideals and reconciles them in the unity of niṣkāma karma which implies activity with a specific attitude.

The practice of niṣkāma karma presupposes a true understanding of man's essential nature and involves a preliminary discipline which alone can generate the appropriate attitude. In the first instance, it insists on a moral discipline of the intellect known as sāṅkhya buddhi and vyavasāyātmikā buddhi. Owing to ancient avidyā, which is its original (or originless) sin, the pure self forgets its intrinsic worth and spiritual destiny and wanders in the world of ignorance and sin (avidyā and karma). In its endless hazards and hardships, it at last ascends to the level of humanity and tries to realise its rationality. Man, though often impelled by the instincts and appetites of his animal nature, has yet, unlike the animal, the conception of the end. He is self-conscious and has viveka. He has the power of discrimination and the ability to arrive at a decision. In the dynamism of activity, he can distinguish the puruṣa from prakṛti, the kṣetrajña from the kṣetra, and realise that all work is due to the activity of prakṛti and that the puruṣa or true Self is untainted by karma and is not attached to it. The puruṣa has a nature of his own and is distinct from prakṛti and its twenty-three modifications which form the material of the universe. The ātman or dehī is ever self-conscious and free. It is aparīṇāmī, immutable, i.e., not subject to the mutations of matter. It is unborn, eternal, permanent and ancient and does not die with the body.* Being immaterial, it does not suffer decay, death or decomposition. It is pramātā, the subject that is self-conscious and conscious of the world of nature. Distinct from the dehī is the deha or body opposed to it in every way. Owing to its pariṇāma svaabhāva, the body goes through a flux of cyclic transformations and is subject to birth, youth, manhood, age, decay and death, familiarly known as the six-fold changes (ṣaḍbhāva vikāras). The body is an aggregate of elements (bhūta saṅghāta), a mere psychophysical series which the self elicits from nature to fulfil its moral destiny. An aggregate is only an accidental conjunction and, therefore, its several parts can enter into new combinations. Birth and death are a part of this phenomenal flux and they belong to the deha and not to the dehī. At birth, the self puts on a new garment, as it were, for its moral use and death is merely the putting off of that garment when it has worn out or served its purpose.

vāsāmsi jīrṇāni yathā vihāya
navāni gṛhṇati naro (a) parāṇi |
tatha sarīrāṇi vihāya jīrṇān —
yanyāni samyāti navāni dehī ||

—ii. 22.

By disciplined discrimination, the individual realises his true nature and knows that he is different from prakṛti and its mutations and is, therefore, indifferent to them. The sthitadhī or person of firm understanding is beyond the dualism of hope and fear, gain and loss, joy and sorrow; without attachment to anything, he has neither hates nor desires. This true insight into the nature of the ātman coupled with a will to realise it more and more fully makes for real wisdom and supreme bliss. As reason and will are one, sāṅkhya buddhi develops into vyavasāyātmikā buddhi without which no spiritual endeavour is ever possible. Avyavasāyātmikā buddhi is consciousness of sensibility in which the mind is distracted by desire. Such a mind is clamant and chaotic. Its eccentricity clouds the reason and corrupts the will. Dwelling on the objects of sense, the mind gets attached to them. Anger comes in the wake of attachment. From anger arise delusion and loss of memory. The understanding is then destroyed and that results in spiritual death.* But vyavasāyātmikā buddhi consists in non-attachment to sensuous objects, in the stability of reason and concentration of will. When discrimination ends in decision, the mind is dominated by a single-minded devotion to moral and spiritual effort. Then buddhi issues its commands to manas without yielding to its impetuosity. When a man's mind runs after the objects of sense, it carries off with it the understanding, as a gale carries away a ship on the waters.† Viṣaya kāma or desire for material objects, to which one is drawn by the senses, is varied and causes vacillation of mind. But, if a man's senses are withdrawn from their objects, his wisdom is firmly set. In him, viṣaya kāma is displaced by ātma kāma. The realisation of his inner self is the supreme end of all his endeavour. He is self-satisfied (ātmanyevātmanā tuṣṭhaḥ). In viṣaya kāma, the sensitive self is shut up in its particular perishing feelings; but reason demands a process of unity and stability which can be achieved only by the concentration of the mind. The will is divided and dissipated by the propulsions of sense and becomes unstable and obscure; but vyavasāyātmikā buddhi insists on collectedness and concentration or the unity of activity. The principle of a good will which is at once enlightened and centred, frees karma from the perils of moral particularism and bases it on a rational comprehensiveness. If the mind is withdrawn from sense-objects and given a moral direction, this fleeting flux of desires vanishes and there arise moral fixity and spiritual finality. The acquisition of such vyavasāyātmikā buddhi, of a disciplined discrimination, is an essential preliminary to the attitude of mind which alone will enable one to practise niṣkāma karma.

According to the Sāṅkhyan view, a life of activity resulting from the interplay of prakṛti and puruṣa is an obstacle to mukti and keeps the self in chains. The intelligent puruṣa should try to break loose from these shackles and delight in Jñāna Yoga rather than in karma.

dūreṇa hyavaram karma
buddhi yogād dhanañjaya | —ii. 49.

Far inferior is karma to yoga. But, by merely avoiding active work, no man can ever be free from a life of action.

na karmaṇām anārambhāt
naiṣkarmyam puruṣo (a) śnute | —iii. 4.

Nor can one remain inactive even for a moment.

na hi kaścit kṣaṇam api
jātu tiṣṭhatyakarmakṛt | —iii. 5.

Thus, the ethical situation seems to involve a dilemma. Whereas it is impossible for any one to remain inactive at any time, a life given to incessant activity seems to be opposed to mental equipoise and serenity which are so necessary for spiritual progress. The Gītā succeeds in resolving this dilemma by its theory of niṣkāma karma. All karma, or voluntary action, involves the idea of an end. The realisation of this end brings satisfaction to the doer, while its frustration fills him with disappointment and depression. Generally speaking, karma is kāmya karma, motivated by the realisation of an end, and is determined by the subjective inclinations of rāga and dveṣa (appetition and aversion) and the objective consideration of utility, lābha and alābha (gain and loss). The guṇas of prakṛti and their interplay are ultimately responsible for these factors that determine the reason and direct the will in respect of the kāmya karmas.

The wise man who knows the tattvas and distinguishes between the ātman and prakṛti is able to trace the root of all karma and assess it at its proper value. He traces all empirical actions to the interplay of the guṇas and the feeling of ahaṅkāra by which the ātman falsely identifies itself with the body. He knows that the true self is essentially free from such empirical determination.

prakṛteḥ kriyamāṇāni
guṇaiḥ karmāṇi sarvaśaḥ
ahaṅkāravimūdhātma
kartāham iti manyate

tattvavit tu mahābāho
guṇakarma vibhāgayoḥ
guṇā guṇeṣu vartante
iti matvā na sajjate

—iii. 27, 28.

The philosopher who knows the nature of the self attributes his karma to the activity of the cognitive and conative sense organs and the vital impulse and is convinced that the ātman is, by nature, free from the fetters of karma. The realisation of this foundational fact that the body is the battle-ground with good and evil as the contending forces and that it is the preponderance of the guṇas, sattva, rajas and tamas, that influences and determines this conflict, will lead to a correct appreciation of the place of karma in the scheme of moral life. From this follows the first formula of Karma Yoga which is stated as follows : Act only on the knowledge that your action is influenced by prakṛti and the guṇas. The self has nothing to do with the springs of action and its essential nature is not tainted by them. Not knowing this, the ignorant are attached to karma, being misled by the dispositions of prakṛti. But he who knows the truth about karma is unattached to it or to its consequences. His actions are not prompted by inclination or desire. Moral life consists in the giving up of egoistic, utilitarian and acquisitive instincts, karmabhāva and kartr̥bhāva. Kāmya karma is the offspring of pathological love seated in the propulsions of sense and is, therefore, influenced by inclination. Reason counsels or commands the will to free itself from the ends of inclination and establish its inherent right of self-sovereignty or moral autonomy. The will, being essentially free, consents to obey the command, and this the categorical imperative of duty as formulated in the Gītā in the ever-memorable words :

karmaṇyevādhikāraṣṭe
mā phaleṣu kadācana |
mā karmaphalaheturbhūh
mā te saṅgostvakarmaṇi ||

—ii. 47.

“In work alone lies thy duty, never in the fruits thereof. Do not work for the fruit nor should you desist from work.”

In one word, the Gītā recommends the ideal of niṣkāma karma, of duty done for its own sake, not out of desire for, or attachment to, its consequences. No man can escape from karma; but he must remember that his action is influenced by prakṛti and its guṇas. Action arises out of the dispositions of the body, and should not spring from the desires of the mind. Kāmya karma fetters the mind and fouls the spirit. Niṣkāma karma implies the necessity of acting from respect for the imperative of duty. It eliminates the influence of inclination and implies respect for the practical reason. Reason excludes all the sensuous springs of rāga and rejects the impetuous claims of ahaṅkāra (egoity). The imperative of duty is not dictated by hedonistic or utilitarian considerations, but is disinterested and categorical.

A true understanding of the nature of the self subjects the mechanism and motive of conduct to a critical examination and makes the moral life truly intelligible. Such a critique of conduct instructed by reason develops into moral insight. From this point of view, the Socratic saying that virtue is knowledge becomes significant.

sarvam karmākhilam pārtha
jñāne parisamāpyate |

—iv. 33.

Where the will is guided by reason as opposed to the ends of inclination, it is self-determined. Duty is determined by rational insight into the nature of the self, and then reason and activity are in perfect accord. The ideal inspires the actual and the actual stabilises the ideal. Knowledge and action are the obverse and the reverse of the same law of duty and represent its static and dynamic sides. Thus practical reason has a theoretical and a practical side and both point to the same truth. When this truth is perceived, karma ceases to be karma, for it does not cling to the doer. Then, the wise man sees action in inaction and inaction in action.

karmaṇyakarma yaḥ paśyet
akarmaṇi ca karma yaḥ |
sa buddhimān manuṣyeṣu
sa yuktaḥ kṛtsnakarmakṛt ||

—iv. 18.

Such niṣkāma karma is morality touched with the metaphysical knowledge that neither the roots of action nor its fruits pertain to the self. A person endowed with such knowledge, single-minded in his devotion to the self, renouncing all motive dictated by self-interest, realises that karma is externally determined by the body as a mode of prakṛti and is no more deluded by the ancient confusion of the ātman with the deha or body. He performs his actions giving up all attachment and his karma is burnt up in the fire of knowledge. In the performance of duty, the will is rationalised and the element of jñāna dominates over the conative or affective elements of the ethical situation. The moral philosopher knows that the ātman is essentially self-conscious, but that, owing to the causality of karma, it mistakes itself for the body and feels that it is the agent. But, really speaking, it is the conative and the cognitive senses and the bodily organism that do the work. The senses function in their specific way and the physical organism maintains itself. But, the self is different from the pseudo-self with its prakṛti vāsanā which is the real actor in the world of sense and sensibility. One who thus knows the true nature of the self and has realised it is not affected by karma.

ātmavantam na karmāṇi
nibadhnanti dhanañjaya |

—iv. 41.

The theory of niṣkāma karma does not counsel renunciation of all activity. What is recommended is not karmatyāga (renunciation of action) but karmaphalatyāga (renunciation of the fruit of action). The Gītā does not ordain absolute inactivity, but only insists on unattached activity; freedom in action and not from action. This conclusion is reinforced by the following considerations: In the cosmic operation of karma, no one can be still or inactive even for a moment. The ascetic who suppresses only his outer sense-activities without curbing and negating his internal desires is a hypocrite.* Likewise the pseudo-sannyāsins of the shirk-work, sour-grape and even starve-sense types only bring the holy order into contempt and serve to condemn and stultify themselves. Unhealthy repression and self-mortification often lead to violent reactions and reckless voluptuousness.† Moral activity is helpful even in the case of the contemplative jñānī who practises introversion (jñāna niṣṭhā) and seeks śānti by stilling the vāsanās. Desire for abstention from work is as much determined by the guṇas as the desire for work. Disciplined activity, far from being an impediment, may often be a corrective to the lapses of a purely contemplative life. Karma Yoga has always the three-fold advantage of naturalness, ease and efficacy. Even Janaka, who was a spe-realist in introversion and in samādhi, wore the crown with ease and lived for world-welfare. By doing his duty in a disinterested way, even the butcher in the blessed city of this royal sage acquired moral autonomy more truly than the ascetic in the forest who controlled the mind and yet cursed the crow. A true Karma Yogin may appear to be immersed in activity ; but he practises inner detachment. Like the water on the lotus leaf, he is in the world, but not of it. Even in Jñāna Yoga which insists on introversion, the yogī has to resort to karma in the interests of maintaining his body and its health. The duty of every man is determined psychologically by his svabhāva or inner disposition. If a Kṣatriya like Arjuna whose bent of mind is for righteous warfare abandons his duty, his impulsive asceticism is sure to react on him and lead to moral disaster. Even Īśvara, who is absolutely pure and perfect, employs Himself in activity and His will is immediately fulfilled in work for the redemption of the world. Īśvara is ever pure and perfect ; He is kartā (the doer) and yet akartā (the non-doer). Even so, a wise man sees action in inaction and inaction in action. He who has specialised in the philosophy of action, the kṛtsnavit, knows that jñāna or akarma is an activity and that karma presupposes jñāna. Conation is rationalised and reason is conative. In this way the kṛtsnavit knows all things and becomes a kṛtsnakṛt doing all good things.

Niṣkāma karma is renunciation of kāma and not of karma, of the doer-mentality and not of the deed.

yasya sarve samārambhāḥ
kāmasankalpavarjitāḥ |

—iv. 19.

The actions of the sage are devoid of desire and self-will. He also gives up attachment to the fruit of works. Such a person, though ever engaged in work, does not work at all.

tyaktvā karmaphalāsaṅgam
nityatrpto nirāśrayaḥ |
karmaṇyabhipravṛtto (a) pi
naiva kiñcit karoti saḥ ||

—iv. 20.

He knows that the roots of all his actions arise from the anātman and that their fruits belong to the Paramātman. The karma alone is performed without the desire for the fruit arising from it. Niṣkāma karma does not consist in mere conformity to a dogma which is fixed and formal. It is not simply right action, but righteous action regulated by reason and śraddhā or enquiring faith. Mere karma without the illumination of jñāna is blind and mechanical. It is like the human body without the head. Mere jñāna without the dynamic or moving power of karma is emptied of content; it is like the head without the trunk. Karma supplies the content of conduct and jñāna determines the right attitude of doing work. Sāṅkhya and Yoga are not contradictory methods but are complementary like form and matter or like the universal and the particular.

sāṅkhya yogau prthak bālāḥ
pravadanti na paṇḍitāḥ |
ekamapyāsthitas samyag
ubhayor vindate phalam ||

—v. 4.

And again

ekam sāṅkhyāṇ ca yogaṇ ca
yaḥ paśyati sa paśyati ||

—v. 5.

Sāṅkhya and Yoga form together the theory and practice of conduct. Jñāna is not abstract thought devoid of content, but is immanent in volitional activity and illumines its nature. Karma is the dynamic side of the moral law. When kāmya karma is given a new direction by the rational insight afforded by jñāna, it changes from prudential expediency to inner excellence. Then the violent warfare in the moral life between the "is" of sensibility and the "ought to be" of reason is reconciled by the concept of niṣkāma karma. In the history of this conflict, the "is" at first ousts the "ought" and the sensualist follows the propulsions of the sensitive self as a matter of course and enjoys sense gratification. But the appetitive self thrives on desire and grows by what it feeds on. Its wants increase with satisfaction. In the second stage, there is a reaction on the side of ascetic suppression in which passion is sought to be eliminated by reason. The moral law excludes all sensible springs. But excessive inhibition is as ruinous to moral life as excessive impulsion. In the third stage, a reconciliation is effected between sensibility and reason by the formula of niṣkāma karma. Karma is the dynamic power of duty exalted by inner detachment.

This formula is applied to the three Vedic karmas of yajña, dāna and tapas (sacrifice, gift and austerity). Yajña or sacrifice is the essence of ethical life. The human body is moulded out of the cosmic stuff and is therefore, a microcosm or miniature cosmos. The constituents of the physical organism of the jīva are taken from the physical universe. The cell is reproduced from the parental life. Its food is gathered from the vegetable and the animal kingdom. Its mind stuff is derived from the cosmic source and presided over by the gods that perform functions assigned to them in maintaining the cosmic order. The self is a social being and cannot sustain itself without social help ; it owes its moral and spiritual life to the grace of the guru. In this way, the cosmos is one single organism or systematic unity in which there is no gap between atom, cell, sense, self and society. All these are interconnected and form a single universe as opposed to the multiverse of the pluralist. The main purpose of the universe is to be the vale of soul-making. It is the arena where salvation is sought and secured. But the empirical self with its acquisitive instinct of ahaṅkāra (egoism) has usurped the cosmic elements and made them its own. Yajña is only a grateful offering made by the jīva as the moral self to the universe for what it has received from it in its psycho-physical make-up. It is divided into pitṛ yajña, deva yajña, bhūta yajña, nṛ yajña and Brahma yajña or duties to ancestors, to the celestial world, to the material world, to society and to the guru. The conduct of the empirical self is determined by the guṇas and the Gītā describes the three-fold classification of yajña. Tāmasa yajña is the mechanical performance of sacrifice without faith in the Vedic imperative and without the will to give, and is, therefore, a self-regarding activity. It is an offering to the dark and malignant powers and not to the friendly gods that help the ethical purpose of the universe. Rājasa yajña is an offering to the lower gods with a view to obtaining recognition and reward and is characterised by ostentation. In sāttvika sacrifice, there is no bargain with the gods and it is therefore disinterested duty and opposed to cosmic commerce with the gods. The Gītā insists on the performance of yajña as nişkāma karma.

aphalā kāṅkṣibhir yajño
vidhi dr̥ṣṭo ya ijjate |
yaṣṭavyameveti manaḥ
samādhāya sa sāt̥tvikaḥ ||

abhisandhāya tu phalam
dambhārtham apī caiva yat |
ijjate bharataśreṣṭha
tam yajñam viddhi rājasam ||

vidhihinam asr̥ṣṭānnam
mantrahinam adakṣinam
śraddhāvirahitam yajñam
tāmasam paricakṣate ||

—xvii. 11, 12, 13.

Dāna is charity or the practice of benevolence. In its tāmasa aspect, it is indiscriminate as it has no regard for the qualifications of the receiver or the nature of his specific requirements. Rājasa dāna is based on calculation and expectation of return; it is a gift for some consideration. Sāt̥tvika dāna is beneficence done for the sake of duty and not from a desire for personal gratification. The left hand does not know what the right hand gives; yet, the gift is based on discrimination and is given to the man who deserves it and according to his needs. Of these three, the sāt̥tvika type of gift alone is worthy of adoption.

dātavyam iti yad dānam
 diyate (a) nupakārīne |
 deśe kāle ca pātre ca
 taddānam sātत्वikam smṛtam ||

yattu pratyupakārārtham
 phalam uddīśya vā punaḥ |
 diyate ca pariklīṣṭam
 tad dānam rājasam smṛtam ||

adeśakāle yad dānam
 apātrebhyaś ca diyate |
 asatkṛtam avajñātam
 tat tāmasam udāhṛtam ||

—xvii. 20, 21, 22.

Tapas is the need for the ethical purification and perfection of the individual in thought, word and deed (manas, vāk, kāya). It is also three-fold, tāmasa, rājasā and sātत्वika. Tāmasa tapas is rooted in stupidity, ignorance and perversity and involves injury to one's self. Rājasā penance is for personal glorification and is achieved by self-mortification and infliction of injury on others. The seeker after siddhi is not satisfied with worldly gains, but aspires for celestial greatness and glory. Sātत्वika tapas is a process of self-discipline in thought, word and deed. Physically, it connotes the practice of bodily purity or continence, ahimsā and reverence for holy men. Speech is truthful and polite, satya and priya. The control of the mind consists of freedom from anger, self-restraint and self-knowledge and the desire for universal welfare.

devadvijaguruprājña—
 pūjanam śaucam ārjavam |
 brahmacaryam ahimsā ca
 śārīram tapa ucyate ||

anudvegakaram vākyam
 satyam priyahitam ca yat |
 svādhyāyābhyasanam caiva
 vānmayam tapa ucyate ||

manaḥ prasādas saumyatvam
 maunam ātmavinigrahaḥ |
 bhāvasamśuddhir ityetat
 tapo mānasam ucyate ||

śraddhayā parayā taptam
 tapas tat trividham naraṁ |
 aphaḷākāṅkṣibhir yuktaṁ
 sāttvikam paricakṣate ||

satkāra māna pujārtham
 tapo dambhena caiva yat |
 kriyate tad iha proktam
 rājasam calam adhruvam ||

mūḍhagrāheṇātmano yat
 pīdayā kriyate tapaḥ |
 parasyotsādanārtham vā
 tat tāmasam udāhṛtam ||

—xvii. 14 to 19.

The Gītā thus describes the three psychological distinctions in each of the three duties, yajña, dāna and tapas and extols the sāttvika type as the only righteous course of action.

The moral situation in the Gītā which furnishes the occasion for this ethical teaching is the dilemma in which Arjuna was placed in the battle, in the conflict between ahimsā and warfare. The pacifist is shocked by the disastrous consequences of war, righteous or unrighteous, points to its paralysing and demoralising effect and hopes for the millenium when ahimsā will be the order of the day. The militarist takes his stand on the pugnacious or warring instinct of man which makes for self-preservation and, contending that might alone preserves right, advocates war as the solvent of all disputes. But both pacifism and militarism are extreme theories. The first is desirable, but not possible; the second is possible but not desirable.

Ethics, however, insists on localising warfare and not totalising it. The tāmasa warrior indulges in fighting even non-combatants and kills others for the mere joy of destruction without any discrimination or regard for the rules of warfare. The rājasa warrior is actuated by ambition and love of renown. His is the digvijaya or world-conquest mentality glorying in conquests. The sāttvika warrior ought to engage himself in righteous warfare without any feeling of vindictive cruelty or thought of the consequences.

dharmyāddhi yuddhāc chreyo (a) nyat
kṣatriyasya na vidyate [

—ii. 31.

To a Kṣatriya there is no higher good than righteous warfare. And, says the Lord :

atha cet tvam imam dharmyam

saṅgrāmam na kariṣyasi |

tatas svadharmam kirtīṇ ca

hitvā pāpam avāpsyasi ||

—ii. 33.

Arjuna is a Kṣatriya both by temperament and by training and cannot shirk his duty to fight in a righteous cause, by taking to sannyāsa. He has his own station in life by reason of his varṇa and ought to perform the duties that pertain to that station.

svadharme nidhanam śreyaḥ

paradharmo bhayāvahaḥ |

—iii. 35.

But he must do it in a spirit of disinterestedness. The conviction that the ātman is eternal and the body ephemeral ought to give him the invincible courage that coolly faces death and also the inevitable consolation that warriors that die in battle die by their own choice and that they are only physically mortal. It is really a case of niṣkāma karma when a true Kṣatriya fights for a just cause, not because it excites his instinct or is expedient, but because it ought to be done as duty. The Gītā thus expounds the general principles of niṣkāma karma and expects every man to apply it to particular cases with the rational insight given by sāṅkhya buddhi, but without any sophistry or casuistic dialectic. It insists on the inner worth of action emptied of the subjective inclination of kāma or rāga and the objective ideas of utility and love of honour. The dualism between pleasure and pain, success and failure, therefore, does not enter into the content of the moral imperative. The mind is thus disciplined and well-balanced and acquires an attitude of samatva or equipoise which is the consummation of all moral endeavour. The moral self is no longer the slave of sensibility (kāma, krodha, rāga and dveṣa), but has attained self-sovereignty or moral autonomy (jitātmā). This view of duty avoids the perils of hedonism and intellectualism and effectively bridges the gulf between the two Mīmāṃsās.

kāyena manasā buddhyā

kevalair indriyair api |

yoginaḥ karma kurvanti

saṅgam tyaktvātmaśuddhaye ||

—v. 11.

The advantages that follow from the performance of duty as niṣkāma karma may be briefly summarised. While kāmya karma makes man the creature of sensibility and environment, the imperative of morality as disinterested duty has its own intrinsic values of dignity, purity and sublimity. Kāmya karma has only market or commercial value and makes man the slave of passion and of the propulsions of the senses. But the moral law fosters self-sovereignty (jitendriyatva) by purifying the motive of conduct and raises man from animality to true humanity. Niṣkāma karma shines like a jewel in its own light. The karma yogin is not elated by success nor depressed by failure, but enjoys mental equanimity. Neither the utility of an act nor its futility can affect the good will and its disinterestedness. This attitude of samatva (equanimity) is stated to be the differentium of yoga.

siddhyasiddhyos samo bhūtvā
samatvam yoga ucyate |

—ii. 48.

The yogin realises the spiritual kinship of all selves and his attitude is opposed to the exclusive feeling of the pseudo-self. His action is a good in itself and not a means to something else. It is a universal law that will hold good for all rational beings on account of the similarity of their intelligence or jñāna. The imperative is emptied of the empirical feelings of kāma and krodha and is, hence, worthy of reverence. Karma Yoga is preferable to Jñāna Yoga owing to its ease, naturalness and efficacy. The yogin who does his work disinterestedly is not tainted by evil and is like the lotus leaf that sprouts in water, but is unaffected by it :

brahmaṇyādhāya karmāṇi
saṅgam tyaktvā karoti yaḥ |
lipyate na sa pāpena
padmapatram ivāmbhasā ||

—v. 10.

Such a karma yogin is ever contented (nitya-tṛptaḥ), devoid of all sensuous desire (nirāśīḥ) and full of humility (nirmamaḥ).

CHAPTER V

TRANSITION FROM THE ETHICS OF NIṢKĀMA KARMA TO THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE SELF OR ĀTMAN

THE metaphysic of morals dealing with niṣkāma karma is only a negative account of duty and has to be reinterpreted in terms of the philosophy of the spirit. Niṣkāma karma is conduct freed from the stain of kāma and rāga, but it is not an end in itself. The good will or practical reason on which it is based is a priori and formal, as it is abstracted from contingent experience. Being only a negation of kāmya karma, it does not provide any basis for spiritual insight. It is duty done for the sake of duty and its authority is derived from respect for the moral law. It is opposed to the pleasant and the useful and is independent of the spurious motives drawn from sensibility. But freedom is not merely a negative concept; it means not only freedom from, but also towards. The moral 'ought' implies a deeper 'is', as it is 'being good' that determines 'doing good.' Karma or conduct is a particular expression of character which is the habitual way in which a man acts, and the act reveals his attitude. Character is itself different from the self which lives in a habitual universe, and it is the problem of spiritual philosophy to enquire into the nature of the puruṣa or ātman and determine not only what a man ought to do, but also what a man ought to be. Doing good is on the whole an external point of view, but being good is self-determined and indicates the inner excellence of life. Thus understood, ethical philosophy acquires a new meaning. The principle of conduct does not consist merely in dissociation from prakṛti and self-determination; it is founded on the positive truths of the philosophy of the spirit and self-realisation. Moral consciousness presupposes the existence and eternity of the noumenal self or ātmā as distinguished from the phenomenised jīva or dehātmā which is a mode of prakṛti or matter and becomes the slave of sensibility. When the true karma yogin sheds his ahankāra or egoism and seeks to know his true aham, he develops into the jñāna yogin. Jñāna expounds the method by which the ātman tries to free itself from the confusions of avidyā and the distractions of karma by self-knowledge and self-purification.

The transition from the stage of niṣkāma karma to the ideal of self-realisation is a gradual ascent from moral freedom to spiritual spontaneity. The moral man deliberates on possible alternatives in a conflict of desires and then arrives at a decision. By his buddhi he distinguishes between the ātman and its body and knows that the ātman is apariṇāmī, free from the mutations of matter, avināśī,

the immortal self distinct from the perishing embodied self, and pramātā or subject of experience different from the non-self or acit. When buddhi is well disciplined, it develops into vyavasāyātmikā buddhi, in which the distractions of viṣaya kāma
and moral particularism are replaced by the one-pointed aim of mokṣa kāma or the desire for mukti.
When the moral consciousness of the yogī is definitely determined and becomes steadfast, he grows into a sthita prajña and is on the road to self-realisation. He is well established in jñāna niṣṭhā or the process of introversion by a reflective analysis of the ātman and its distinction from the anātman.
The obstacles to Jñāna Yoga are traceable to the complex of avidyā-kāma-karma. Avidyā makes the jīva forget its spiritual nature and stains its selfeffulgence. It leads to deha abhimāna arising from the false identification of the ātman with prakṛti.
Abhimāna generates kāma or desire for the objects of sense and impels the jīva to karma or ethical action. Karma fetters the self and implicates it in the see-saw of metempsychosis. The mumukṣu realises the follies and evils of this downward course, retraces his steps and gradually ascends to spirituality by abandoning kāmya karma. Practising niṣkāma karma, he transfigures viṣaya kāma

into ātma kāma and, by his moral insight, overcomes the confusions of avidyā. Moral and spiritual ascent is steep and slippery ; but, owing to the freedom which the mind has to arrest the vāsanās and attain mukti, the yogic contemplative exercises the will to know his self by focussing it on the object.

This yogic endeavour admits of four definite and progressive stages which are known as yatamāna samjñā, vyatireka samjñā, ekendriya samjñā and vasīkāra samjñā. *Yatamāna samjñā is the gradual withdrawal of the mind from functioning on the sense-plane and from its allurements and the concentration of it on the self or ātman. It is the process by which the attitude of inwardness is acquired by arresting or inhibiting the outgoing tendencies of the mind. Vyatireka samjñā† is the inner control of the mind by the exercise of the spirit of detachment or udāsīnatva and freedom from elation and depression. Sudden repression may lead to violent reaction and therefore the mind should only gradually be turned to reach this level. But these methods do not take into account the vāsanās imbedded in the deeper layers of the mind. Ekendriya samjñā‡ attempts to unroot the original propensi-

* ii. 58.

† ii. 57.

‡ ii. 56.

ties to ignorance and to evil (anādi avidyā karma vāsanā) by concentration on the nature of the self as the centre of serenity and stability. The mind is gently drawn from its materialistic consciousness by stilling the vāsanās by thinking them away and has the anticipatory satisfaction of self-realisation. But, even this stage is negative as ignorance and evil remain therein as a real possibility. So, in the fourth stage of vaśikāra samjñā,* self-renunciation or vairāgya is followed by self-realisation or ātmā-valokana. The puruṣa no longer deludes itself as a mode of prakṛti, but returns to itself. It is now a self and not a depersonalised process. It now shines in its own effulgence and has intrinsic joy. It is not indriyārāma but ātmārāma. The pleasures which the empirical self derives by its external possessions are ephemeral and perishing ; but, the self-satisfaction which accompanies the knowledge of the self has eternal value.

The self may be defined negatively by the refutation of the theories which explain it in terms of matter, life, mind and reason, and positively as the spiritual entity that shines for ever by its own effulgence. The physical philosopher or the Dehāt-mavādin describes it as an epiphenomenon or as an assemblage of atoms. But matter has no life or consciousness and does not reflect on itself. The Prāṇātma-vādin defines the self as life or vital impulse that has inner activity and the power of multiplying itself ; but consciousness cannot evolve out of life. Therefore the Indriyātma-vādin or sensationist explains it as a cluster of sensations ; but no sensation is self-conscious or conscious of unity. The Antaḥkaraṇa-vādin or mentalist defines it as a psychic continuum ; but the ātman or the 'I' is different from the empirical 'me'. The rationalist defines the self as a rational being ; but reason does not exhaust the spiritual consciousness. The ātman is different from the physical and the mental processes and from jñāna and is not only metaphysical but metapsychical ; it is eternal and immutable and persists in all states of consciousness. The terms 'soul', 'spirit', 'self', 'individuality' and 'personality' do not bring out the full meaning of the word 'ātman' which can be only experienced and not defined. Its experience is not inferred, but directly intuited. This intuition presupposes moral and spiritual discipline, and Jñāna Yoga is the process of discrimination (viveka) and dissociation (vairāgya). It consists in the intellectual discernment that the ātman is not the body, the senses or the mind, involves the emotional discipline leading to vairāgya and leads to the attainment of moral and spiritual autonomy.

The jñānī who has achieved this self-realisation adopts the following dictum of the moral law in the manifold details of his daily life and conduct. It may be called the second of the ethical imperatives: "Know that you are the ātman or self and not the body or mode of prakṛti and that other beings are also selves." This consciousness enables man to form a correct estimate of the nature and function of action in moral life, divests him of attachment to karma and its fruits and frees him from the taint incidental to it. Realising his true nature as a puruṣa, he ceases to be the victim of the forces of prakṛti and attains autonomy and self-mastery. When he knows that other individuals also are puruṣas like himself, he comes to appreciate and respect their personality and learns to look on them not as means for the gratification of his own purposes, but as entities endowed with an individuality similar to his and pervaded by the same supreme and universal Spirit in which all beings abide.

The ātman has intrinsic worth and is to be looked upon as a person and not as a thing. Humanity should be treated as an end in itself and never as a means to an end. The ātman is free from the pairs of opposites and returns to itself by reflecting on its own self-effulgent nature. In terms of the spiritual philosophy of the ātman, yajña is the sacrifice of egoism in the fire of jñāna. Dāna is the social virtue of perceiving the similarity of all persons as ātman and not as things made of prakṛti. Tapas is the practice of self-purification in thought, word and deed and connotes the spiritual habit of inwardness acquired by ceaseless thinking on thought itself. Self-knowledge is not a process of logical abstraction and mere self-renunciation, but connotes the supremacy of soul-power over brute force and the might of reason. Self-sovereignty or spiritual autonomy acquired by jñāna transcends the values of economic gain, political power and even the might of devaloka.

Jñāna Yoga culminates in the consciousness of unity among the infinite variety of living beings, in their sub-human, human and celestial embodiments. The Gītā analyses four stages of soul culture in the ascending order of their valuation. In the first stage called sarvatra samadarśana, the yogī who has intuited his ātman sees a similar self in all selves owing to the affinity and unity of their attributive spiritual consciousness.

sarvabhūtastham ātmānam

sarva bhūtāni cātmani |

īkṣate yogayuktātmā

sarvatra samadarśanaḥ ||

—vi. 29.

Yajñadatta that is in the body of a dog is similar to Devadatta that dwells in a celestial body. It is the karma-ridden bodily tenement that obscures the spiritual vision and distinguishes one jīva from another. But, to a man with ātma drsti or spiritual consciousness, all jīvas are alike.

vidyā vinaya sampanne
brāhmaṇe gavi hastini |
śuni caiva śvapāke ca
paṇḍitās samadarśinaḥ ||

—v. 18.

By renunciation (vairāgya) and inwardness (jñāna niṣṭhā), the man of true culture attains the spiritual quality of sweet reasonableness. But the divine consciousness which is the real bond of unity is not yet discernible in this state. In the second stage known as divine sāmya, the yogī visualises in a spiritual way the similarity of the pure ātman to the Lord and thus he perceives God in all jīvas and all jīvas in God.

yo mām paśyati sarvatra
sarvañ ca mayi paśyati |

—vi. 30.

In the third stage, such similarity is perceived even when the yogī is not practising introversion. The fourth stage of yoga is its practical application to the exercise of disinterested love to all beings in their joys and sorrows.

ātmaupamyena sarvatra
samam paśyati yo (a) rjuna |
sukham vā yadi vā duḥkham
sa yogī paramo mataḥ ||

—vi. 32.

The practice of Jñāna Yoga or the way of illumination presupposes a scheme of physical and mental discipline which is expounded in the sixth chapter of the Gītā. The yogī as jītātmā who has attained self-conquest should subdue the dvandvas or pairs of opposites like heat and cold and his mind should not be affected by environmental changes and affective states of pleasure and pain. The economic values of property and wealth should have no attraction for him as they pertain to the earthbound self and not to the puruṣa. He should be indifferent whether a thing of prakṛti is dust or diamond.

jītātmanah praśāntasya
paramātmā samāhitah |
śītoṣṇa sukha duḥkheṣu
tathā mānāpamānayoḥ ||

jñāna vijñāna trptātmā
kūṭastho vijitendriyah |
yukta ityucyate yogī
samaloṣṭāśmakāñcanaḥ ||

—vi. 7, 8.

In practising spiritual kinship, he rises above the social distinctions due to birth, sex, rank and character. He has, therefore, no friend or foe, no relative or stranger; nor does he recognise the ethical distinctions between a good man and a wicked man as all jīvas are essentially good.

suhṛnnmitrāryudāsīna
madhyasthadveṣyabandhuṣu |

sādhūṣvapica pāpeṣu

samabuddhir viśiṣyate ||

—vi. 9.

Equipped with these disciplines, the yogī should select a clean and solitary place and retire into the “cell of self-knowledge” and concentrate on the ātman without mental distractions. When the mind is thus focussed on the ātman in conformity with the rules of Ātma Yoga and the unified mind is turned inward, the thoughts that distract the mind and make it restless are thought away by ceaseless practice and with a spirit of renunciation.* The verb “to have” should be deleted from the grammar of Jñāna Yoga and all lust and love of the baser sort which is the very food of I-hood should be destroyed.

The practice of Jñāna Yoga involves many factors. First comes yama which consists in the cultivation of the five virtues known as aparigraha (non-possession), asteya (non-stealing), satya (truthfulness), brahmacarya (continence) and ahimsā (non-violence). Next come niyama, which includes meditation on the meaning of the Vedāntic texts, śauca (self-purification), santoṣa (contentment) and tapas (austerity). Prāṇāyāma is breath control leading to the control of the prāṇa. Pratyāhāra is the process of arresting the outgoing activities of the senses. Dhāraṇā is the fixing of the mind on the subject of introversion. Samādhi is the direct realisation of the ātman and the consummation of moral and spiritual endeavour contained in dhyāna and dhāraṇā. Faith is then fulfilled in soul-sight. The highest ideal of the yogic process is self-realisation or Brahma nirvāṇa preceded by a stripping of ahaṅkāra (egoism).

* vi. 35.

yogī yuñjīta śatātām
 atmānam rahasi sthitaḥ |
 ekāki yatacittātma
 nirāśir aparigrahaḥ ||
 śucau deśe pratiṣṭhāpya
 sthīram āsanam ātmanāḥ |
 nātyucchritam nātinīcam
 cailājīnakusottaram ||
 tatraikāgram manaḥ kṛtvā
 yatacittendriyakriyāḥ |
 upaviśyāsane yuñjyād
 yogam ātma viśuddhaye ||

—vi. 10, 11, 12.

The mind of the yogī who has stilled his outgoing desires and focussed his attention on the ātman is like the unflickering light of the lamp.

yathā dīpo nivātaśtho
 neṅgate sopamā smṛtā |
 yogino yatacittasya
 yuñjato yogam ātmanāḥ ||

—vi. 19.

The spiritual philosopher who seeks to know the ātman is an ārurukṣu and he becomes the ārūḍha when he intuits himself. While the knowledge of the ātman in Jñāna Yoga is mediate, in ātmāvalokana it is an immediate intuition. The existence of the ātman is thus proved by directly experiencing it. The ātman thus attains its stirless serene consciousness or kaivalya by complete dissociation from the shackles of sensibility. It has won its true freedom from the causal chain of karma and enjoys eternal felicity (nitya tr̥pti).

yatroparamate cittam
niruddham yogasevayā |
yatra caivātmanātmānam
paśyannātmani tuṣyati ||

—vi. 20.

The joy of self-realisation has an intrinsic and eternal value unlike the sense-pleasures fraught with pain and frustration. There is no happiness in the world or in Svarga which is good without qualification, except ātma sukha. Freed from the distractions of kāma or sensual desires and the confusions of avidyā, the yogī attains śānti, the inner peace that passeth all understanding and the sinless stillness state of Brahma nirvāna or ātmāvalokana described as “the flight of the alone to the alone”. A desire may be externally determined like bāhya viṣaya kāma (love of external objects) and have a peripheral origin; or, it may be centrally originated in the individual himself (saṅkalpaja) like the inner attachments that enchain the self. Physical pains and sorrows caused by men or things should be endured with fortitude. Mental pains should be entirely subdued as the ātman is essentially blissful without even a shadow of pain or suffering. The yogī who conquers rajas by sattva and has praśānta manas (serenity of mind), intuitively the ātman and is thus free from the fetters of senses and transcends the influence of all guṇas. He is the true pañḍita and discerns and intuitively the ātman, realising the spiritual kinship and unity of all jīvas. His knowledge (vidyā) that the ātman is different from the spurious self of prakṛti ripens into vinaya and sweet reasonableness. The illumined self sees a similar self in all beings owing to the similarity of their jñāna and makes no difference between a god and a dog. Having subdued the ills of samsāra, he is self-satisfied (ātmārāmaḥ). The dross of karma is consumed away by the fire of jñāna.* All activity is swallowed up in the intuition of ātmāvalokana. He delights in benevolence to all beings (sarva bhūta hite rataḥ) as in removing their poverty, disease, illiteracy and ignorance. Thus equipped with the negative virtues of the renunciation of the sense of ahaṅkāra and the conquest of the tāmasa and rājasa instincts of pugnacity, fear, anger, acquisitiveness and sex and with the positive virtues of inwardness, viññāna and vinaya, he attains Brahma nirvāṇa and devotes himself to beneficent activity.

labhante brahmanirvāṇam
 rsayaḥ kṣīṇakalmaṣāḥ |
 chinnadvaidhā yatātmānah
 sarvabhūta hite ratāḥ ||

—v. 25.

To the kevalin, seeking God is only a means to his seeing the self. He attains the spiritual freedom which arises from a sense of dissociation from prakṛti and dependence on the cosmic Ruler. The quiet of kaivalya, however, often leads to quietism and subjectivism, and the kevala is stranded in solid singleness without the glow of godliness, though he is freed from the ills of samsāra. His spiritual attainment gives only a negative quiet and not positive union with the divine and is, at best, a half-way house to the perfection of mukti. As regards the value of kaivalya, one school maintains the view that kaivalya is not on the road to mukti, but is mukti itself in which the mukta enjoys supreme peace. Another school favours the theory that the kevala is on the path to perfection and will eventually reach the divine goal. The path of devotion leads to God and not away from Him, and the instinct which the kevala has for the Infinite soon asserts itself and urges him to shed his sinfulness arising from self-satisfaction and self-alienation. He is on the right path in so far as he has discriminated between prakṛti and puruṣa, freed himself from the shackles of prakṛti and turned his attention Godward. The kevala is transformed into the jñānī, hungers for God and attains the bliss of immortal communion with Him. The scope and value of this religious realisation form the subject-matter of the next chapter.

CHAPTER VI
TRANSITION FROM THE
PHILOSOPHY OF THE SPIRIT
TO THAT OF RELIGION

THE theory of niṣkāma karma establishes the nature of right conduct á priori by self-legislating reason or buddhi which excludes the empirical determination of prakṛti and the guṇas or necessitation from without. But this definition of duty as self-consistency with buddhi is formal and negative; it should lead to the more fruitful and concrete idea of consistency with the self or puruṣa. The Kantian view of the moral imperative based on the distinction between reason and feeling and persons and things is very suggestive; but it suffers from excessive formalism owing to the opposition it creates between reason and sensibility and its abstract conception of personality and the kingdom of ends. Though it tends to rationalise and socialise conduct, it has no clear idea of the nature of the self and it ignores the vital relation between ethics and religion. This defect is more clearly discernible in the Sāṅkhyan theory of morals on account of the absolute distinction it makes between the puruṣa and prakṛti and its failure to solve the dualism between the two. The Gītā view of Puruṣottama as the inner Self of all persons or puruṣas remedies the fatal defects of the meta-physic of morals ending in deism and the rational view of conduct leading to quietism. When moral consciousness fills up in meaning, it is enriched by the idea of spiritual realisation and acquires a new orientation in the religious ideal of duty as a means to self-realisation.

The first six chapters of the Gītā deal with the rationalisation and spiritualisation of conduct as the means to the goal of religious consciousness which is treated in the next six chapters. The ātman is immutable and eternal though, owing to avidyā-karma, it permits itself to be moulded by matter and its mutations. Dehas vary and vanish, but the dehin or ātman is immortal and eternal. Self-knowledge is attained by Jñāna Yoga and by the disinterested performance of duty without subjective inclinations and utilitarian ideas. Karma is rationalised by jñāna and jñāna is vitalised by karma and there is action in inaction and inaction in action,* and Jñāna Yoga has its fruition in self-realisation or ātmāvalokana. Self-purification and self-knowledge are only stepping stones to mukti and not stopping places and the next six chapters expound the way in which ethical endeavour and spirituality have their fruition in the philosophy of religion. Reason demands categorically the disinterested performance of duty, and the philosophy of the self insists on the need for the knowledge of the self as different from the psycho-physical configuration. But it is only the philosophy of religion or parā vidyā that gives a meaning to the system of nature or avyakta and to the eternal values of the self or akṣara, like truth, goodness and beauty. The yogī or the jñānī, who seeks Paramapuruṣa, the Self that abides in all beings, is no longer ego-centric, but shifts his centre to God and becomes theo-centric.

vedeṣu yajñeṣu tapassu caiva
 dāneṣu yat puṇya phalam pradīṣṭam |
 atyeti tat sarvaṁ idam viditvā
 yogī param sthānam upaiti cādyam || —viii. 28.

The nature of Brahman and the appreciation of the transvaluation of values as expounded in the second śaṭka may briefly be expounded in the light of the philosophy of religion. The Absolute of philosophy or Brahman is the God of religion or Puruṣottama and is logically the Highest, ethically the Best and aesthetically the most Beautiful. From the standpoint of ontology, Brahman is satyam, jñānam and anantam; it is real Reality in which all thinking things and objects of thought live, move and have their being. Brahman is the ultimate subject of all knowledge and transcends the subject-object relation arising from that between the jīva, the subject of experience, and prakṛti or kṣetra, the object of experience. It is the infinite that is rooted in the finite and transcends its finitude and is the Eternal of eternals. Cosmology expounds Brahman as the first cause of all beings and the final cause of all sentient experience. All beings merge into the sat in pralaya and emerge from it in sr̥ṣṭi. The All-Self or Vāsudeva is immanent in the world and at the same time eminent. The ethical quality of Brahman refers to His transcendental purity and perfection. All beings rest in Him, but He does not rest in them.* From the religious standpoint Brahman is the śarīrin that sustains the jīva, rules it from within and makes it a means to His satisfaction. He is closer to life than breathing and is yet transcendently holy. He is the world-ground as well as the spiritual goal of life and by attaining Brahman the jñānī attains the highest end of life. In this way Brahman, the Absolute of philosophy, as the all-inclusive unity, becomes the supra-personal Īśvara or Puruṣottama and the claims of monistic thought and ethical religion are reconciled.

The chief idea of ethical religion is the definition of Īśvara as Ruler and Redeemer. He is not an extra-cosmic designer that creates the world by His omnipotence and lets it go; nor is He an indifferent spectator or eternal dreamer, but is the One without a second that wills the many, becomes the manifold and enters into the world of cit-acit as its Inner Ruler Immortal. The omnipotence of Īśvara is self-limited by His righteousness and, though He is the real actor in the universe, He is not touched or tainted by the errors, evils and imperfections of life. The existence of evil and unmerited suffering may not be causally explained; but it cannot be traced to divine arbitrariness and cruelty. The responsibility rests primarily on the freedom of the finite self and Īśvara as the righteous ruler of the world metes out justice according to the deserts of the individual or his karma. Goodness and godliness are indistinguishable as God is satyakāma and satyasaṅkalpa and His will, unlike human purposes, is immediately self-realised. Īśvara is not only the benign Providence, the giver of all goods satisfying all our wants, but is also the all-Destroyer. When evil multiplies itself by annihilating virtue and threatens the moral order of the world, retribution on a cosmic scale becomes inevitable and death is the wages of wickedness and sin. In moments of moral crisis in history when vice tyrannises over virtue and seeks to enthrone itself in its place, the Lord of righteousness incarnates into the world with a view to punishing the evil-doer, redeeming him from his career of wickedness and re-establishing the reign of righteousness.

paritrāṇāya sādḥūnām
 vināśāya ca duṣkṛtām |
 dharma samsthāpanārthāya
 sambhavāmi yuge yuge ||

—iv. 8.

The Gītā view of the avatāras is the master-thought of ethical religion; but its unique value is misunderstood by hostile critics and explained away by some of its followers and admirers. The historicity of Kṛṣṇa is doubted and denied by the former and the avatāra is regarded as the creation of the poetic or purāṇic imagination. The historic view accepts the fact of the avatāras, but denies their miraculous origin and explains their birth and death as the normal facts of human experience. Others trace the story of the avatāras to the ethics of evolution and relate them to the onward march of the world. Still others deny the divinity of the avatāras and treat them as liberated souls born to serve others as exemplars of humanity. The Vedāntic monist rejects the anthropomorphic view of the descent of Viṣṇu from Vaikuṇṭha and expounds the avatāra as an extraordinary manifestation of life and holds that every man can become an avatāra or yogīśvara. There is really no distinction between the pillar and Puruṣottama though they mark the beginning and the end of the evolutionary series. When the believer is assailed by historic and philosophic criticism, he takes refuge in allegory and thinks of the avatāra as the higher mind or ātman battling with the lower and conquering it. One other explanation consists in showing the self-contradictions of the finite-infinite involved in the avatāra concept and tracing it to the conjoint effect of reality and māyā and the defect inherent in the conceptual reading of the Absolute. The avatāra is mortal like all men and is only an illusory appearance of Brahman.

The theory of divine incarnation is the basic concept of theism regarded as ethical religion or the religion of redemption and should be expounded only in the light of its central teaching. The condemnation of the avatāra by the hostile critic is due to prejudice deepening into hatred. 'Foolish people fancy me to be a man, ignoring my transcendent nature.'

avajānanti mām mūḍhāḥ
 mānuṣīm tanum āśritam |
 param bhāvam ajānantaḥ
 mama bhūta-maheśvaram ||

—ix. 11.

The scientist who relies on the evidence of sense-perception rejects the supernaturalistic account of the avatāras; but his view is partial and fragmentary. History narrates human events in their temporal order and does not refer to the eternal that is in the temporal and beyond it. The absolutist who traces the worship of the avatāra to

refuge in allegory and thinks of the avatāra as the higher mind or ātman battling with the lower and conquering it. One other explanation consists in showing the self-contradictions of the finite-infinite involved in the avatāra concept and tracing it to the conjoint effect of reality and māyā and the defect inherent in the conceptual reading of the Absolute. The avatāra is mortal like all men and is only an illusory appearance of Brahman.

The theory of divine incarnation is the basic concept of theism regarded as ethical religion or the religion of redemption and should be expounded only in the light of its central teaching. The condemnation of the avatāra by the hostile critic is due to prejudice deepening into hatred. 'Foolish people fancy me to be a man, ignoring my transcendent nature.'

avajānanti mām mūḍhāḥ
 mānuṣīm tanum āśritam |
 param bhāvam ajānantaḥ
 mama bhūta-maheśvaram ||

—ix. 11.

The scientist who relies on the evidence of sense-perception rejects the supernaturalistic account of the avatāras; but his view is partial and fragmentary. History narrates human events in their temporal order and does not refer to the eternal that is in the temporal and beyond it. The absolutist who traces the worship of the avatāra to

Jñāna is no longer viśaya jñāna or ātma jñāna, but has reference to Brahma jñāna. Empiricism gives place to spiritual knowledge and finally to the knowledge of the Supreme Self. Viśaya kāma is transfigured into ātma kāma and finally into Bhagavat kāma. Likewise kāmya karma is transformed into nṣkāma karma and then into kainkarya. Work is changed into the worship of God. In this way, the psychic activities with their factors of cognition, feeling and conation are at first spiritualised and then divinised. The subject of every thought is not only the self, but its inner Source; the real actor in every moral situation is not merely the jīva, but Īśvara; and every emotion like fear, anger and sex loses its sting by being spiritualised and given a Godward direction. Duty is divine command addressed to the moral and spiritual consciousness and is performed as consecrated service. The formula of duty from the religious standpoint is stated as follows :

“Regard all your actions as determined by Bhagavān or God as the ultimate subject or kartā.”

mayi sarvāṇi karmāṇi
sannyasyādhyātmacetasā |
nirāśīr nirmamo bhūtvā
yudhyasva vigatajvaraḥ ||

—iii. 30.

The finite self has the moral freedom to attain sovereignty over its empirical nature by subduing

Jñāna is no longer viśaya jñāna or ātma jñāna, but has reference to Brahma jñāna. Empiricism gives place to spiritual knowledge and finally to the knowledge of the Supreme Self. Viśaya kāma is transfigured into ātma kāma and finally into Bhagavat kāma. Likewise kāmya karma is transformed into nṣkāma karma and then into kainkarya. Work is changed into the worship of God. In this way, the psychic activities with their factors of cognition, feeling and conation are at first spiritualised and then divinised. The subject of every thought is not only the self, but its inner Source; the real actor in every moral situation is not merely the jīva, but Īśvara; and every emotion like fear, anger and sex loses its sting by being spiritualised and given a Godward direction. Duty is divine command addressed to the moral and spiritual consciousness and is performed as consecrated service. The formula of duty from the religious standpoint is stated as follows :

“Regard all your actions as determined by Bhagavān or God as the ultimate subject or kartā.”

mayi sarvāṇi karmāṇi
sannyasyādhyātmacetasā |
nirāśīr nirmamo bhūtvā
yudhyasva vigatajvaraḥ ||

—iii. 30.

The finite self has the moral freedom to attain sovereignty over its empirical nature by subduing

tasmāt tvam uttiṣṭha yaśo labhasva
 jītvā śātrūn bhunṅṣva rājyaṃ samṛddham |
 mayaiṃvate nihatāḥ pūrvameva
 nimittamātram bhava savyasācin || —xi. 33.

Human personality is not an end in itself as its freedom is determined by its past life and the will of God. This does not mean that the self drifts between destiny and divinity without any initiative of its own. The empirical self is, no doubt, caught up in the dilemma of determinism and is unable to extricate itself from the evils of fatalism on the one hand and divine determinism on the other. While science depersonalises man and makes him the slave of causality, religion reduces him to the position of a conduit pipe and makes him the passive instrument of divine omnipotence. But ethics is founded on the freedom of the self and no power on earth or in the celestial world can conquer a man who has conquered his lower self and attained moral svarāj. Ethical religion reconciles the dualism between human and divine freedom by the idea that man may attain mastery over his lower self in order that his true self may be attuned to the will of God who is the real Self or Creator of creators. Freedom is a real possibility and man can rise to godliness or sink into sin ; he would be spiritually free but for himself. The responsibility for evil and sin rests with the jīva, and Īśvara is ever pure and perfect, though, as the moral Ruler, He metes out justice in accordance with the karma of the individual. When the jīva, as mumukṣu, realises its true nature, it sheds its ahaṅkāra and offers the true aham to the inner Self.

“Our wills are ours we know not how,

Our wills are ours to make them Thine.”

This change from the ego-centric predicament to the theo-centric marks a revolution in conduct and is of great spiritual significance.

But there are rebellious wills which are averse to such self-surrender. They are of four types: the ignorant (mūḍhāḥ), the lowest of men (narā-dhamāḥ), the deluded (māyayāpahṛtajñānāḥ) and the demoniac (āsurambhāvamāśritāḥ). The ignorant man forgets his dependence on God and feels that the world exists for his pleasure. Those who have a vague faith in God, but do not seek Him, are the lowest in the human scale. The perverse type employs illicit arguments (kutarka) to disprove the existence of God. The demoniac man is the worst sinner of all, because he knows well that there is God, but, seized with hatred, he defies Him and deifies himself. These materialists are enveloped in ancient avidyā, have a propensity for sensuality and sin and are caught up in the vicious circle of likes and dislikes (icchā-dveṣa) and the samsāric wheel.

na mām duṣkṛtino mūdḥāḥ
 prapadyante narādhamāḥ |
 māyayāpahṛtajñānāḥ
 āsuram bhāvam āśritāḥ ||

—vii. 15.

There are four types of men who have faith in God, and they worship Him in four different ways.

caturvidhā bhajante mām
 janās sukṛtino (a) rjuna |
 āрто jijñāsurarthārthī
 jñānī ca bharatarṣabha ||

—vii. 16.

They are the man in distress (ārtah), the seeker of the self (jijñāsuḥ), the man who aspires for wealth and power (arthārthī) and the seeker of God (jñānī). The first and the third seek God by prayer and praise in order that they may be blessed with the goods of life (aiśvarya) extending, it may be, even to world-sovereignty. They have an assured belief in the infinite benevolence of God as the giver of all good. They have their reward; but they cannot attain eternal life as even Brahmaloka has a beginning and an end. The universe of space-time is only the bad infinite and in prākṛta pralaya even Brahmā who rules the cosmos has to perish along with it.* The seeker after kaivalya or the kevala is a contemplative who seeks God to attain the state of kaivalya and freedom from the ills of samsāra. But he is stranded in singleness or solitude devoid of the bliss of divine life. It is the jñānī that seeks God as the Life of his life and Love of his love and yearns for communion and union with Him. God is dear to the jñānī and the jñānī is dear to God; he realises the truth that Vāsudeva is the Self of all and he is a mahātmā.

teṣam jñānī nityayuktaḥ
ekabhaktir viśiṣyate |
priyo hi jñānino (a) tyartham
aham sa ca mama priyaḥ ||

—vii. 17.

bahūnām janmanām ante
jñānavān mām prapadyate |
vāsudevas sarvam iti
sa mahātmā sudurlabhaḥ ||

—vii. 19.

The whole scheme of yoga consisting of Karma Yoga, Jñāna Yoga and Bhakti Yoga is the building up of bhakti and is a ladder, as it were, from worldliness to divine life. By self-stripping and introversion, the yogī turns to God as his very self and becomes a bhakta whose only aim in life is absolute devotion to Him. The direct means to mukti is Bhakti Yoga which is ceaseless meditation on God in the form of remembrance which acquires the character of intuition or direct perception. Bhakti is different from the religion of fear, the religion of prayer to God for obtaining boons here and in Svarga and from the religion of the ritualists who worship the devas and not their inner Self. The Lord is a jealous God who insists on exclusive love to Him in absolute self-surrender to His redemptive will. It is not the thing that is offered to God, but the spirit of riveted thought and rapt love behind it, that is pleasing to Him, and even a leaf, flower, fruit or water available everywhere satisfies Him if it is the offering of love.* Whoso loves God with all his heart dwells in Him, and He dwells in him. The Gītā thus extols bhakti as guhyaatama or the most sacred truth of religion, superior even to the high Vedāntic truths of philosophy (guhyaatara) and the Vedic imperatives of duty which are merely guhya. The devotee who dedicates his work to God, whose thought is focussed in Him and whose love is sustained by His love lives only in the life and love of God.

mayyeva mana ādhatsva
 mayi buddhim niveśaya |
 nivasiṣyasi mayyeva
 ata ūrdhvam na saṁśayaḥ ||
 manmanā bhava mad bhakto
 madyāji mām namaskuru | mānevaiṣyasi satyam te
 pratijāne priyo (a) si me ||

—xii. 3.

—xviii. 65.

But the mere practice of the presence of God implied in bhakti, without His saving grace, does

* ix. 26.

not secure the stability of salvation. The sinfulness of sin is so deeply ingrained in human nature that it cannot be expiated by retribution or even by remorse. As Portia said to Shylock, 'In the course of justice none of us should see salvation.' Though avidyā-karma creates the propensity to evil and is beginningless, it is not endless, and it can only be destroyed by kṛpā or dayā. The Gītā is essentially the gospel of redemption through grace. No man can be a light unto himself, and even the rationalistic non-dualist does not expect to realise the Self without relying on the grace of his guru or God. The Self cannot be gained by karma tyāga or even by philosophic reflection. Whom the Self chooses, by him He is attained; to him the Self reveals His being.* It is only to the loving bhakta that Bhagavān bestows the knowledge of attaining Him.

teṣām satatayuktānām
bhajatām prītipūrvakam |
dadāmi buddhiyogam tam
yena mām upayānti te ||

—x. 10.

He is dear to the jñānī as his Self and the jñānī is dear to Him as His self. The devotee ascends to divine life and divinity descends into the heart of the devotee and bhakti has its consummation in the union of the two. It is incarnational love that brings out the redemptive attributes of God like saubhāgya (easy accessibility to all), vātsalya (affection), āśritapāratantrya (dependence on the bhakta) and parama kārūṇya (infinite tenderness). The omnipotence of God is self-limited by righteousness and righteousness is rooted in redemptive mercy and the true incarnational motive consists in the redemption of man from his sinfulness. Egoity or ahaṅkāra which is the root-evil of life is removed only by Īśvara prasāda.

The whole teaching of the Gītā is summed up in the divine imperative of redemption as follows: "Renouncing all dharmas, rely on me alone as thy refuge. I will deliver thee from all sins. Grieve not."

sarva dharmān parityajya
mām ekam śaraṇam vraja |
aham tvā sarvapāpebhyo
mokṣayiṣyāmi mā śucaḥ ||

—xviii. 66.

This verse contains the quintessence of ethical religion and it is God's call to humanity to respond to His redemptive love by absolute self-surrender or prapatti and thus attain the stability and security of mukti. It brings to light the full implications of the doctrine of prapatti as a view and way of life, that Brahman is the Supreme Self of all beings and the Saviour of all jīvas and is Himself the way and the goal of life. The Eternal of eternals in the transcendental sphere becomes the Infinite as the cosmic ground, enters into the finite as its immanent Self and incarnates into humanity. The one increasing inner purpose of this divine descent is the redemption of all jīvas. Human endeavour to ascend to divine life by the moral, philosophic and spiritual ways of karma, jñāna and bhakti is, by itself, futile and ends in failure. Eternal life is not gained by mere individual effort. The elaborate discipline of Bhakti Yoga is rigorous and exacting and does not admit of exceptions, lapses and expiations. The one and only way of release and redemption from the evils of 'sam-sāra lies in the absolute and deathless faith in Īśvara as the only Lord of love without a second, in relying on His grace by shedding all sense of egoistic responsibility and in responding to the call of divine grace. The divine call is the assurance that He gives bhakti and mukti to all those that are heavily laden and helpless and seek Him as the only hope of life. Emancipation is not exit from life or freedom from action, but is freedom in action, and the prapanna realises that the Lord alone is the upāya and the upeya, the endeavour and the end in life. Stripping himself of the sense of agency, egoity and self-love, he surrenders himself to His redemptive purpose. Prapatti may be an alternative to bhakti or the direct way to mukti; but, it has universal applicability and every one can attain salvation irrespective of his birth, worth and station in life. Śrī Kṛṣṇa is the very concretion of kṛpā and divine Saviour of all, and since every jīva has its home in God, its sins are forgivable and forgiven; and thus all may attain mukti. The divine imperative thus guarantees eternal blessedness to every one who seeks refuge in the Supreme as his only Saviour. Divine life is the birth right of every man as the son of God and he can regain his godliness; for, he is essentially god-like in nature.

CHAPTER VII

PURUṢOTTAMA VIDYĀ

THE Gītā is a synoptic philosophy par excellence as it thinks things in their togetherness, correlates the truths of science, ethics and religion and presents them in a clear, distinct and comprehensive way. Chapters 13 and 15 deal with kṣetra, kṣetrajña and Puruṣottama or the Supreme Self, the scientific view of the process of nature or prakṛti, the ethical and spiritual idea of the progress of man or puruṣa and the religious teaching of the divine plan and purpose of soul-making extolled as the most sacred yoga. Prakṛti, puruṣa and Puruṣottama are entities that are eternal and not external to one another. Soul-making is the plan of creation and the endless procession of natural events serves as a field for moral and spiritual progress till the jīva is ātmanised and attains the divine nature. It is scientific insight to know that matter or prakṛti is being and becoming, without lapsing into the evils of materialism; spiritual wisdom to intuit the nature of the self as self-effulgent and free, by avoiding the pitfalls of mentalism and humanism; and a divine gift to realise that Paramapuruṣa is the source, centre and goal of all human striving or puruṣaprayatna. To appreciate the meaning and value of the divine purpose of creation, it may be interesting to compare this view with the western theories of evolutionary ethics in the ascending order of importance.

Evolutional ethics starts with the theories of natural selection and survival of the fittest and ends with the hope that in future, egoism and altruism will be perfectly adjusted. If nature is 'red in tooth and claw' and only the fittest survive and not the best, it is difficult to conclude that co-operation will in the end supersede competition. The holistic theory of evolution gives priority to matter and fails to reconcile it with the primacy of the spiritual values of life. According to emergent evolution, consciousness has emerged newly from the stuff of space-time and Deity will be the next arrival; but it does not explain how or why emergents emerge.* Positivism goes a step further when it insists on the need for moral progress and regards the welfare of humanity as its religion, but humanity as such without reference to individuals is an abstraction and there can be no religion of humanity without God. The evolution of a classless homogeneous society by equalising material goods is sociologically impossible. The ethics of social evolution in terms of western altruistic feeling based on the distrust of intellectual growth leads to racial bias and arrogance and is opposed to the needs of humanism. Higher still in the scale of progress are idealistic theories testifying to the moral and spiritual progress of man. Some of them refer to a growing God proceeding from perfection to perfection. History in the highest sense is not the history of philosophy but is philosophy itself and it is opposed to theology and its ideas of the millennium. The universal is the particular and it lives in the historic expressions. The progressivist thinks that there is more value in the pursuit of truth than in its possession. But endless progress is self-contradictory as there can be no progress without an end to be attained. Supernaturalistic ethics is based on faith in scripture and the apocalyptic idea that on the Day of Judgment the elect will be sent to Heaven and the heathens will be sent to everlasting hell. This theological faith attributes caprice and cruelty to God, the Giver of all good. The absolutist rejects the above theories and regards the Absolute alone as real, and moral and spiritual progress as self-contradictory.

* Some evolutionists hold the view that evolution is the unfolding of what is there already and is not the emergence of something new. Still others think that it is a cyclic process in which progress and regress alternate.

The Gītā view of ethical philosophy remedies the defects of the western theories by its distinction between prakṛti, puruṣa and Paramapuruṣa as taught in the 13th and the 15th Chapters and satisfies the highest needs of science, ethics and religion. The theories of natural evolution, emergence and holism are reinterpreted in terms of the pariṇāmic process of prakṛti. The views of positivism and social evolution are restated as the ideals of the moral progress of the puruṣa and self-realisation in its individual and collective aspects. The law of pariṇāma states that prakṛti not only is but also becomes. The visible and tangible universe or the world of space-time does not consist of fixed natural kinds but is a process without beginning or end. Likewise, from the biological and psychical standpoint, life is a continuous creative evolution and the psychical processes are particular, perishing states and both life and sensation are a ceaseless flux without any fixity. Matter serves as a medium for soul-making but the materialist who explains the soul in terms of physical and cerebral changes is entirely wrong. The self is free and immortal and, from the moral standpoint, its conduct is not determined by the environment but is the expression of moral freedom and the real possibility of spiritual progress. While process is physical, progress is biographical and self-determined.

Progress involves an ideal to be realised and it is self-knowledge or soul-cognition. Self-realisation has its fulfilment in the religious ideal of the attainment of God-consciousness. The one increasing purpose that runs through the ages is the completion of the work of soul-making by Puruṣottama. Though prakṛti, puruṣa and Puruṣottama are distinguishable, they are not really separable. They are eternal entities that are not mutually exclusive as they are organically related like soul and body. Matter is real but materialism is not true; humanity has intrinsic value but humanism is not true. The Absolute or God is real, but absolutism is false.

The 13th and 15th chapters impart the knowledge of the distinction between prakṛti and puruṣa and Puruṣottama or what is more important to the spiritual philosopher, the contrast between kṣetra and kṣetrajña or the jīva and its body, gross and subtle. The cosmos is constituted by the union of matter and soul or prakṛti and puruṣa. Prakṛti consists of eight categories, namely, the five elements, manas, buddhi and ahaṅkāra. It is the aggregate of the elements, bhūta saṅghāta rūpa. The Gītā practically adopts the Sāṅkhyan theory of the evolution of prakṛti and the mind-body of the jīva, consisting of mūlaprakṛti, mahat, ahaṅkāra, manas, the five elements, five cognitive sense organs, five conative sense organs and objects of experience or bhoga. Matter is the mother of all things. It is the kṣetra or field of the moral and spiritual progress of the kṣetrajñā or jīva, the knowing subject that experiences the pleasures and pains of the mind-body and, owing to its innate moral freedom, the jīva can subdue the instincts of kāma and krodha or sex and anger and the utilitarian ends of success or failure and pleasure or pain and attain self-sovereignty and the intrinsic dignity of personality. The ātman is an eternal and spiritual entity and shines by itself freed from the bodily distinctions due to sex, age, caste and the specific forms of animal, human and celestial life. As an aid to self-realisation is enjoined the practice of the virtues like vairāgya or self-renouncement, ahimsā, ārjava or purity of thought, word and deed, faith in the guru and bhakti. The jīva that dwells in the tree of samsāra or aśvattha, as the samsārin, reaches its eternal nature by uprooting the tree with the aid of detachment or asaṅga. The relation between the ātman and its mind-body is not one of parallelism or interaction nor is it to be viewed in terms of materialism and spiritualism as in western thought. The kṣetrajñā is, owing to avidyā, conjoined with the kṣetra, but it can realise its own eternal nature as the akṣara and be free from contact with prakṛti. The kṣetrajñā thus realises his spiritual or kaivalya state different from the space-time process and the contractions of mind-body due to karma. The mortal self or kṣara thus becomes the immortal or eternal akṣara beyond prakṛti, the pure self (śuddhātma) which is nir-guṇa and niravayava and svaprakāśa (self-effulgent). The kṣetrajña who identifies himself with prakṛti and its saṅghāta or the mind-body and subjects himself to the adventures and hardships of avidyā-karma, at long last knows his spiritual stability, experiences his kinship with other jīvas who are also ātman and not the body and thus has a vision of the unity of all jīvas from Brahmā to the amoeba. Every jīva is a person or ātman and not a thing or mode of matter and all jīvas are similar in their essential nature. Spiritual progress has its consummation in the realisation of ātman as the self of man and the practice of maitrī and karuṇa or benevolence extended to all living beings. While the matter-bound self suffers from the sense of separateness (prthak bhāva), the freed self realises the kinship of all creatures.

Morality points beyond itself and is fulfilled in spiritual realisation, and spirituality has meaning only in religious experience. Soul culture is no doubt superior to the materialised outlook or dehātmabhāva, but it lands us in the godless state of sāṅkhyā kaivalya or quietism. The Gītā shifts the centre of reference from puruṣa to Puruṣottama, from adhyātma vidyā or the philosophy of the self to Brahmavidyā or the religious consciousness and thus marks a revolution in ethical religion. Ātman is eternal or self-luminous. But Paramātmān is the All-Self who is the eternal among the eternals, the light of lights and the ever perfect. Paramapurūṣa is pure and perfect and it is the divine purpose to divinise the jīva and make it perfect. The theory of purpose or teleology applies to the supra-personal as well as to the personal. Teleology as applied to religions is above the finite intellect and will, as it refers not to an external designer but to divine immanence. The infinite will of God who is satya-kāma and satyaśaṅkalpa is immediately self-realised and therefore there is no contradiction in the divine nature between moral progress and divine perfection. The main purpose of Paramapurūṣa as the first cause and the final cause of the world order and as the upāya and upeya or the unity of endeavour and end is the redemption of all jīvas from the triple imperfections of ignorance, evil and ugliness, by freeing them from their career of sinfulness and self-alienation from God. Though the Lord in and outside us makes for righteousness by meting out justice to every one according to his karma, He is at the same time the world redeemer, as righteousness is pervaded by and transfigured into redemptive love. Dayā or forgiveness over-powers karma and ousts it out. It is the free gift of God and the supreme good that is won by human freedom; moral responsibility is changed into spiritual responsiveness to the divine call of kṛpā. The love of Puruṣottama to puruṣa is prior to and has primacy over the love of puruṣa to puruṣa; the Lord says that the jñānī who seeks Him is a rare mahātmā and is His very life and soul. His love is transcendental in Paramapada, invasive in cosmic life turning evil into good, immanent in the heart of all jīvas and is an incarnation into history in moments of moral crisis as in the case of Kṛṣṇāvatāra. Paramātmā is perfect in Paramapada and it is His purpose to perfect every jīva.

The inner meaning of ethical philosophy as outlined in the Gītā is thus summed up in the keywords of process, progress, purpose, as employed in science, ethics and religion respectively. The world of prakṛti or nature is a cyclic process of sṛṣṭi-pralaya without beginning or end and when puruṣa identifies himself with prakṛti or matter and becomes a kṣetrajña or phenomenalised self, he subjects himself to the travails of birth and death or the ills of samsāra. While the empirical self is causally determined by prakṛti and the guṇas, the real self is self-determined and free to shape its destiny. With the help of wisdom or jñāna, he comes to think that, by nature, he is niravayava and nirguṇa, free and blissful, and strives to regain his self-sovereignty or maheśvaratva ; nature serves as a field for his moral and spiritual progress and self-expression and in the state of ātmajñāna he is no longer matter-bound but is kuṭastha or matter-free. But the spirituality or kaivalya of the akṣara is mere inner quiet without the positive joy of divine communion, and it is the divine plan and purpose to brahmanise the *jīva by the alchemy of redemptive love. The wise man who knows this sacred vidyā of Puruṣottama transcending ksetra and kṣetrajñā and kṣara and akṣara, becomes perfect like Him. He overcomes the evils of materialism, humanism and abstract monism and transcends the moral distinctions of punya and pāpa and the condition of kṣetra and kṣetrajñā. This vidyā or philosophy may be called supra-personal absolutism and is the most sacred of all vidyās.

* tadā vidvān punya-pāpe vidhūya nirāñjanaḥ paramam sāmyam upaiti.—Muṇḍ. Up., III. i. 3.

CHAPTER VIII

THE PROBLEM OF EVIL AND ITS SOLUTION

THE enquiry into the problem of evil and suffering is important in every system of ethics. On its right understanding and proper solution depend a satisfactory metaphysics of ethics and ethical religion. The propensities of evil in the individual caused by avidyā-karma taint the will and stain the soul itself. Man, in his upward march, which is rendered steep and difficult by these age-long obstacles, has to contend against and overcome them by moral endeavour and spiritual insight. Moralists and theologians have attempted to investigate the source of evil, hoping thereby to obliterate it by rooting out its cause. Others again have pictured good and evil as always fighting against each other ; and the duty of the moral man is said to be to ally himself with the good as against the evil. To still others, good and evil are essential antithetical elements in the cosmic scheme. There are those again who hold 'that there is no such thing as evil and that there is nothing good or evil in the world but thinking makes it so'. Thus the problem of evil has been one of the persistent problems of ethics, metaphysics and religion.

The problem may be considered from the standpoint of theism, pantheism and monism and formulated in terms of karma, evil and sin. The theory of karma may be expounded by distinguishing its three aspects, namely, the psychological, the ethical and the religious. The first gives a causal explanation of moral experience and explains the inequalities of life and the fact of unmerited suffering on the ground that a man reaps what he sows. This scientific view denies caprice and contingency in the cosmic order and its denial of freedom in the realm of morals leads to determinism and fatalism and breeds pessimism. But, ethically considered, man is essentially free to shape his future and attain self-mastery. Karma on the religious level refers to the limitations of pāpa and puṇya and the possibility of overcoming them by God's kṛpā. The problem of evil may be analysed into the physical, the moral and the metaphysical. Physical evil is practically the same as suffering, whether it is self-originated or externally originated, but it may not be the effect of moral evil. The suffering of the mother for the sick child is prompted by love and has no taint of evil. Selfless workers even court physical suffering in redressing moral evil. Moral evil is the transgression of the law of duty, and the evil-doer suffers from the sting of conscience. Matter or embodiment is not an evil; but the materialistic view that makes the self an emergence of matter is false and leads to evil. Metaphysically, evil is privative and contingent and is causally inexplicable. It is said to be due to the obscuring power of avidyā or self-contradiction that somehow infects the Absolute, or to the upādhis, the real limiting adjuncts of Brahman. But the root cause of evil, avidyā or upādhis, cannot be determined, as their logical analysis leads to the fallacy of infinite regress. The pantheistic view that whatever is is right, leads to shallow optimism and is not supported by the facts of moral experience. The problem of sin is essentially religious, though it is closely related to that of morality. Moral evil is traceable to the violation of a moral obligation; but it deepens into sin when duty regarded as a divine command is violated. Pāpa karma is the transgression of the śāstraic imperative of duty. Christian ethics describes sin as an inner defect or depravity of human nature and holds that the will is perverted by original sin. Sin is the sense of guilt arising from the collision of the human will with the divine. But this view of statutory religion is not accepted by Kant and he interprets sin ethically as radical evil whose origin in man is timeless. The imperfections of life like error, evil and ugliness are ultimately due to human responsibility and blame-worthiness.

Ethical religion is justified in its recognition of the existence of evil and sin as a fact of experience, and this cannot be explained away dialectically in terms of avidyā, upādhis or mere appearances of the Absolute, which is beyond the relativity of good and evil and the duality of punya and pāpa. The law of karma as a scientific explanation of unmerited suffering makes the jīva responsible for all its acts ; but, in its religious aspect, karma is out there as evil or sin to be destroyed by kṛpā. Evil undoubtedly is, but ought not to be ; the 'ought to be' rests on a deeper 'is'. The effect of karma is entirely destroyed on the awakening of the religious consciousness and mukti transcends the moral sphere of punya and pāpa.* The theory of the eternal fight between good and evil or God and the devil argues imperfection in the divine will and affords no hope of stability and security. It tends to make God a finite being fighting against the forces of evil with a will to victory and with the co-operation of man. The doctrine of original sin militates against the view of divine righteousness by attributing arbitrariness and cruelty to God. It is however the faith of ethical religion that evil can be surmounted by goodness and godliness, as evil exists by the good that it contains and is, by itself, sterile and self-nugatory. Though avidyā-karma is anādi or beginningless in the sense that its origin cannot be logically explained, it has an end. Just as the causal analysis of disease is only for the purpose of curing it, the explanation of evil is only with a view to its eradication. The genetic view dealing with the origin of evil is not so important as the spiritual purpose of liquidating it.

* Taitt. Up., II. ix.

The crux of the problem of ethical religion consists in the reconciliation of the sinfulness of man with the goodness of God. The theological faith that, when we please God by prayer and praise, Providence satisfies human wants and desires, is countered by the argument of the atheist that it is a commercial religion and that the so-called proofs of God based on teleological and moral ideas are just the proofs in favour of atheism and scepticism. The fact of unmerited suffering is a slur on the goodness of God; the world is not ruled by mercy, but is the worst of all possible worlds. The Infinite as the creator of all beings suffers in infinite ways as a glorified samsārin. It is not a consolation to be told that evil is a blessing in disguise and that suffering is beneficial, especially if it is unmerited. The theistic idea that the good man or sāttvika merits salvation and that the sinner is hurled into eternal hell suffers from the defects of predestination and divine determinism. The solution of the absolutist is no solution at all as the moral distinction between good and evil is treated dialectically as the distinction between jñāna and ajñāna or the unconditioned and the conditioned, to be sublated or self-transcended. Evil is not transmuted into harmony or absorbed by the reblending of material. Evil is not an original sin nor an inherited propensity, neither avidyā nor upādhi, but is an actual fall from perfection. The only way of remedying this defect is an ascent to God in the light of ethical religion and the acquiring of godliness. Evil is opposed to goodness and is removed by it and goodness is transfigured into godliness or the purity and perfection of God. While rationalistic ethics insists on a life of righteousness, and religion is faith in the redemptive will of God, ethical religion reconciles the claims of both, by the synthetic view that righteousness is consummated in redemption.

The dualism between karma and kṛpā is the knotty problem of ethical religion and it can be solved only by an appeal to spiritual experience. The ethics of karma and dharma is rooted in the religion of redemptive kṛpā and the law of retribution has its meaning only in the truth of divine forgiveness. The sinfulness of sin is a measure of the forgiveness of God. Forgiveness and penitence co-exist and, if sin is forgiven, it means that it is forgivable. Kṛpā is the free gift of God to the repentant sinner and is not the reward of merit as held by legalistic or statutory religion. Redemption does not consist in the cancellation of a debt or sin, but is the spiritual transformation of the whole man. Mercy is divine and is not won by merit or conformity to conventional morality. The Redeemer seeks more the sinner that realises his utter unworthiness and craves for mercy in all humility than the pietist that treads the path of virtue and is conscious of his self-righteousness. The redemptive will of the Lord or Rakṣaka is immanent in the moral will of man and the attitude and the act of self-surrender remove the collision between the two wills and enable the prapanna to know and feel that Īśvara is the only actor in life, being the Inner Self of all, and to act in the light of that conviction. Dayā enters into history and, by mediating between the finite and the infinite, changes the mortal into the immortal and thus infinitises the finite. Every man is the son of God and, by giving up his ahaṅkāra, he gives his aham to God, his real Self, and becomes godlike and perfect.

The central truth of ethical religion is the spiritual faith that the quality of righteousness is fulfilled in redemption and that, though they may be logically distinguished, they cannot spiritually be divided. If righteousness dominates over the redemptive quality, the law of retribution operates with relentless vigour and makes man helpless. If the redemptive idea has despotic sway over that of justice, it makes God arbitrary. The only way of avoiding the extremes of moral rigourism and divine favouritism lies in giving a new meaning to the terms 'justice' and 'mercy' by a synthetic insight into their inseparable relation. In the divine scheme, mercy is the heart of justice and is not something new that is super-added to it. This view alone bridges the chasm between the supernatural realm of grace and the natural realm of karma and dispels the false belief that supernatural grace suspends in a miraculous way the uniformity of the moral order of karma. To substitute magic for morality is to destroy the inner worth of moral life. Mercy is not a miracle, but is morality exalted into the religion of fruition. The mumukṣu has absolute faith in Bhagavān as the upāya and the upeya, the way and the goal, and as the Saviour of all jīvas and, by recognising the futility of human endeavour, casts himself on the mercy of the Rakṣaka or Saviour. He renounces the hedonistic pleasures of Svarga and kaivalya, the moralistic sense of responsibility leading to heaviness of heart and world-weariness and the egoistic idea resulting from ahaṅkāra and mamakāra or 'I' and 'mine'. The one thing that is required is the knowledge that effort as such is futile without contrition, change of heart or gesture. The infinitesimal and the infinite meet in ethical religion and, even in ordinary experience, an insignificant cause may produce a mighty effect like a spark producing a conflagration. A spark of repentance destroys the age-long burden of avidyā-karma and sin. By absolute self-surrender to the redemptive will of God and by self-gift to Him who is the Real Self, the mumukṣu becomes a mukta. The sinner seeks God and is saved and God seeks the sinner and is satisfied. Ultimately, He alone is the prāpaka and the prāpya, the way and the goal. In this way, the moral idea of effortless effort is consummated in the amoral state of redemption and mokṣa.

There is a school of thought holding a view slightly different from that outlined above, which insists on the purely religious view that the grace of God is absolute and unconditioned by human endeavour. Grace is a free gift of God and is not won by human effort. Whom God elects, unto him He reveals Himself, and His grace bloweth where it listeth. The mumukṣu has only to respond to the call of forgiveness and his responsibility lies in receiving with gladness what is given spontaneously and not demanding it as a reward for merit. Redemption is not justified causally but justifies itself and it blossoms freely like a flower; it overflows itself like spring water. It is not meritoriousness that calls out dayā, but it is dayā that calls out meritoriousness. It is the operative or antecedent cause of forgiveness and is not the consequent that follows from yogic discipline. The pardoning Lord in His infinite tenderness seeks the evil-doer and even relishes his physical evil. There is no one who is free from culpability and sin. To err is human and to forgive is divine. The ascent to God by the way of self-effort like bhakti and prapatti is futile like Jacob's ladder to Heaven as it topples down by its very weight; but the descent of mercy into humanity is natural and efficacious. Grace becomes the more graceful the more it is unsought. The mumukṣu should uproot his ahāṅkāra and even the will to seek mukti, become a thinking thing and serve humanity without caring for the social distinctions based on birth and station in life.

The Christian religion of redemption is often compared to the Gītā view and the analogy is striking if not sound. Every man, according to the former, suffers from the taint of original sin and this is removed only by the faith in the redemptive grace of God and the only begotten Son of God who mediates between God and man and atones vicariously for his sins. According to Saint Augustine, grace is a supernatural force infused by God into the elected soul from without and effects a regeneration. Sin is remitted by confession and the process is called justification by works. Other theologians reject this view and extol inner sanctification and justification by faith. These doctrinal differences are more pronounced in Thomism and Molinism. The former accepts the faith in predestination, in which the human will consents to the inflow of God's grace. The latter rejects the above view as it believes in gratia co-operans in which the divine will is alongside of the human. The same opposition is found in the doctrines of mysticism and pietism. Mysticism is inclined towards the faith in the descent of grace into human nature. But pietism stresses the need for the inner conversion or purification of the heart. The conflict between the two faiths is expressed psychologically as that between the self-surrender type and the volitional type and this distinction is said to correspond to the divergent doctrines of the schools of Śrī Vaiṣṇavism known as the mārjāla nyāyā and the markaṭa nyāya or the ways of the cat and the monkey. The Christian theory of the only begotten Son of God, vicarious atonement and the distinction between the elect and the eliminated makes more for exclusiveness and caprice than for universal love. The Gītā idea of redemption has its foundation in the ideas of the immanence of God in all beings and their religions, the incarnational entry into human history in its moments of moral and spiritual crisis and the assurance of salvation to all those who are afflicted at heart spiritually. The Song on the Chariot supplies the philosophical motive to the Sermon on the Mount and checks the theological implications of the doctrines of the only begotten Son, the chosen people and the standardised faith.

The conflict between the two Vaiṣṇavite schools regarding the nature of Īśvarā kaṭākṣa or divine grace is, ultimately speaking, not the same as that between karma and kṛpā or the volitional and the self-surrender types. It arises from the employment of the causal category used in logic and ethics to what is a transcendental experience. Both the schools are agreed in their conclusion that Īśvara is Himself the upeya and the upāya. The difference is only in the starting points and in the emphasis on the values of experience. If grace is absolute or nirhetuka, the consequence would be moral laxity and the predication of caprice to the divine will. If it is sahetuka, grace is conditioned and not spontaneous. The real difficulty lies in reconciling the logical and the moral side of religious life with the alogical and the amoral. But it is the faith of ethical religion that the logical and the moral have their completion in the alogical and the amoral. The relation between the two is ultimately not the external view of causality, but the intrinsic and organic view of mystic experience and, in the relation of love, it is difficult to estimate how much comes from God and how much comes from man. The problem cannot be solved logically and morally; it is dissolved in mystic experience.

Mysticism defines God as Love and the mystic quest is the spiritual yearning of the mumukṣu or the seeker after God for communion with Him. By self-stripping and introversion, the mystic knows that he is the ātman different from prakṛti, that the Lord is the Life of his life and the Love of his love and seeks union with Him. While the philosopher thinks of the unity of reality, the mystic feels the urge for union with God. Of the four types of devotees recognised by the Gītā, the highest place is given to the jñānī or the mystic as he alone knows that Vāsudeva pervades all beings without being tainted by their imperfections. The jñānī's love for God knows no fear; love does not bargain for boons; it is love for love's sake. Jñāna is exalted by bhakti and bhakti is illumined by jñāna and the two are transformed into premā. From the moral standpoint of bhakti the human will is attuned to the divine; from the religious standpoint, it is self-surrender to His redemptive grace; but in mysticism as such, bhakti is the instinct for the infinite. Viṣaya kāma or the animal instinct is changed into Bhagavat kāma or the love for God. The instincts of the natural man like fear, anger, hatred and lust are sublimated and, when they are directed Godward by bhakti, they lose their sting and become the instinct for God. Instead of hankering after earthly things, the mystic begins to hunger for God. Bhakti is not mere intellectual love or the practice of the presence of God, but is an organic craving for God. The true bhakta craves for the intuitive knowledge of the in-dwelling Self which is at once its centre and sanctuary. Sin, in the highest sense of the term, is the feeling of self-alienation and separation from God. The bhakta who reaches this state suffers from the agony of separation which is aptly called in mystic language the 'dark night of the soul'.

Love is a two-sided affair and the bhakta with his genius for God thirsts for reunion with Him. Bhagavān also is seized with soul-thirst and longs for spiritual communion. As the sat without a second, He has no joy in aloneness and the creative urge in Him connotes the One becoming the two and enjoying the game of love. The creator is not merely Brahman or Īśvara, but is transcendental Beauty incarnating into nature and man, in order to beautify the self, His eternal other, and impart His bliss to it. The Kṛṣṇa of the Gītā who is the Inner Ruler of all beings is identical with the Kṛṣṇa of the Bhāgavata who, by his entrancing beauty, allures all beings and ravishes them out of their fleshy attractions. He is the divine Alchemist who transmutes the earthly self into the godlike jñānī when it renounces the dross of sensuality and egoism. It is the game of love in which the Lord forgets His Īśvaratva and seeks the bhakta as His very life, light and love, and the bhakta forgets his creature consciousness and longs to become one with the Lord as His very self. The distinction between the descent of God and the ascent of man, which is maintained in ethical religion, is now swept away in the reciprocal relation of soul-hunger and God-intoxication. When love becomes irrepressible, the game of love is finished and the thought of separateness expires in the enjoyment of union.

In the fulfilment of love and in ecstasy of divine communion which passeth understanding, all conflicts and contradictions are dissolved. The age-long taint of evil and sin is entirely destroyed. All sense of separateness is swallowed up in the bliss of the unitive consciousness, though there is the separate being of the individual. Bliss is a single experience; but it is a double fruition of the prāptā, and the prāpya. Like the river that flows into the sea and loses itself in the ocean and the bride entering into the arms of her lover and losing her self-feeling, the finite self sheds its finitude and is merged in the Infinite.

CHAPTER IX

SPIRITUALITY AND SERVICE

ETHICAL religion has to consider the problem of evil in its social or universal as well as in its individual standpoint. Karma has a social side dealt with in cosmic ethics and is a powerful factor in shaping the moral progress of humanity. The evolutionary process of nature and the moral progress of humanity bring to light the truth of the unity of nature and the kinship of humanity as one single family. The summum bonum of life is not merely the attainment of spirituality and mukti for oneself, but service to all jīvas so that they may also enjoy the bliss of divine life. The aching problem of universal religion is the removal of the dualism between individualism and socialism in spiritual life and the reconciliation of the claims of self-culture and altruism, and of salvation and sarva mukti. The humanitarian is interested more in the promotion of social well-being than in self-culture and self-realisation. No unselfish man can be at peace with himself when his neighbour's house is on fire or the modesty of a woman is outraged. To strive for and be satisfied with mukti while the rest of humanity suffers in this vale of tears does not appeal to the selfless philanthropist who asks :

Is true freedom but to break
Fetters for our own dear sake
And with leathern hearts forget
That we owe mankind a debt ?

Sympathy for the sufferer is human enough, but it is difficult to find out the cause of suffering and cure the ills of mankind. A short critical exposition of the theories which seek to solve the problem may now be attempted.

The materialist is not quite justified in his animal faith that the physical well-being of all is the end of altruistic conduct and in his denial of the need for conservation of spiritual values. The utilitarian view that insists on the promotion of the greatest happiness of the greatest number is founded only on enlightened self-love. Even positivism that expounds the religion of humanity as love and service to humanity as a whole ignores the dignity of personality. Humanism goes further when it recognises the intrinsic value of personality ; but, in its insistence on better-worldliness as opposed to other-worldliness, it is purely secular. Buddhism rightly stresses the need for the practice of universal benevolence or jīva-

and the evil-doer. The ethics of warfare consists in the establishment of righteousness by punishing the evil-doer without any feeling of anger or vindictiveness. The law of retribution brings home to the offender the truth that evil ultimately recoils on the evil-doer and that the wages of sin is death. Righteous warfare in the interests of world welfare ought to be extolled as the supreme duty of a true Kṣatriya and this view avoids the extremes of pacifism and militarism. The chief end of human life lies in disinterested and selfless service to humanity and the promotion of social solidarity. Individualism defeats the very purpose and plan of life and should be replaced by the ideal of corporate life and co-operative effort. If the ascetic prefers the seclusion of contemplative life to social service when his neighbour is in distress and humanity bleeds with the wrong inflicted on it by the aggressor or tyrant, he violates the rules of cosmic ethics and shirks his duty. The Gītā therefore prefers Karma Yoga to Jñāna Yoga and Bhakti Yoga and teaches freedom in action and not freedom from action. The sthitaprajña is an expert as a moral philosopher and exemplar in social life. Janaka and Manu have taught by precept and practice that the mukta lives for the welfare of others and even Īśvara is ever active though He has nothing to gain by such activity. Karma is not subordinate to bhakti, nor is it stultified by jñāna. Karma Yoga is a direct means to Advaitic realisation where one sees the Self in all beings and all beings in the Self and works for world welfare.

According to the view of Aurobindo Ghosh which is called supramental idealism, the Gītā teaching of ascent to Brahman or Puruṣottama is to be supplemented by the yoga of descent from the supramental plane of divine life to the world of matter with a view to spiritualising matter and making the mortal immortal. Divinity descends into matter by a process of self-limitation in order that matter may ascend to the divine level. Matter can be vitalised, mentalised, spiritualised and finally transformed by the Supermind. The lower is not destroyed by the higher, but is assimilated to it. The theory of ascent and descent is the cardinal principle of life leading to the divine integration of all levels of life and completing the circuit. The new yoga not merely balances the three aspects of karma, jñāna and bhakti by divinising human nature, but also synthesises the disciplines relating to puruṣa and prakṛti. Puruṣa and prakṛti are the static and dynamic aspects of the same Reality and avidyā is only an imperfect aspect of vidyā and is not opposed to it. The highest ideal of life is not only mukti or freedom but also bhukti or enjoyment. The three Vedāntic systems of Dvaita, Viśiṣṭādvaita and Advaita do not form an ascending order, but are the three equal aspects or experiences of the same Supermind. In the Supermind, thought, feeling and will are well harmonised. The Absolute and its appearances are integral and the impersonal and the personal are the static and dynamic aspects of the same infinite. Every man has the freedom to realise the divinity in him and all are equally capable of a spiritual ascent and entry into a spiritual brotherhood. There will be a new world order, in which the whole man including his physical nature will be divinised by the removal of disease and death, and society as a whole will be radically transformed. This is a new synthesis of Advaita and Viśiṣṭādvaita, of Sāktaism and Bhedābheda and of the physical and the spiritual, which marks a revolution in religious thought.

But the traditional views of the Vedāntic philosophers have their own clearness and distinctness and still hold the field. According to Advaita understood as non-dualism, monism or singularism, mukti is the immediate knowledge of the identity between the jīva and Īśvara and is not the attainment of a far-off divine event. It is transcendental in the sense that the historical is sublated by the ever existent sat or the eternal. The subject-object relation is self-contradictory and illusory owing to adhyāsa, and the illusoriness vanishes in the relationless Absolute or cit. Even the bliss of Brahman or ānanda has only an empirical value as Brahman itself is bliss and is not the blissful. Thus, in Advaita, Brahma jñāna is Brahman that is jñāna and therefore in mukti there is the cessation of all dharma or naiṣkarmya siddhi. Karma Yoga is practised only in the phenomenal world where there is distinction as well as difference between the doer and the deed and the subject and the object. The ātman appears to act, but is really actionless as it transcends all moral distinctions. When aridyā is consumed by jñāna, pure consciousness alone remains as the one without a second. This does not mean that ethics has no place or value in Advaita. Karma Yoga purifies the mind and frees it from the attractions of kāma, and the mumukṣu does not deviate from the moral path. Even the jīvanmukta, in his vyāvahārika state, works for the welfare of others, and his chief characteristic is jīvakāruṇya and lokasaṅgraha. He is an exemplar in moral life and loves all jīvas as himself. In all his work, the worker is not; it is Īśvara that works through him. But in the final state of mukti or freedom from embodiment and avidyā, the tree of samsāra is cut off by detachment or asaṅga, all vāsanās vanish and the Absolute alone remains as self-identity. The problem of benevolent activity is dissolved in the transcendental experience of nirvikalpa samādhi.

Bhedābheda is opposed to the Advaitic view of the self-contradiction between jñāna and karma and the stultification of karma in the identity-consciousness. The central idea of the ethics of Bhedābheda is known as jñāna-karma-samuccaya or the co-ordination of jñāna and karma. The moralist insists on the primacy of the will on the ground that consciousness without content is inconceivable and that every state of consciousness is essentially conative. The absolutist demolishes this view dialectically by saying that every karma betrays the self-discrepancy between the actual and the ideal and that between the finite and the infinite will, and that the contradiction is overcome when karma is sublated by jñāna. The Bhedābheda-vādin reconciles the claims of karma and jñāna or voluntarism and intellectualism by giving a new meaning to the two and integrating them. The attitude of the active man is changed when he dedicates his work to Brahman in the Gītā spirit of Brahmārpaṇa; and then morality in its highest sense of consecrated work becomes the dynamic element in divine life. Brahman is only saguṇa and not nirguṇa and the meditation on Brahman is with a view to attaining union with it and not āikyā or self-identity. Every act of benevolence is an example of niṣkāma karma or Brahmārpaṇa and karma is jñāna in its concrete and dynamic aspect, and is a direct means to attain Brahman.

Purnaprajña or Madhvācārya, the expounder of the Dvaita school of Vedānta, rejects Advaita as well as Bhedābheda and establishes the theory of realistic pluralism based on the eternal distinction and difference between cit, acit and Īśvara. This theory upholds the monotheistic truth that Brahman is the supreme self-dependent Īśvara absolutely distinct from the world of jīvas utterly depending on His will. Brahman or Īśvara is svatantra or self-existent and the jīva is paratantra or God-dependent. The philosophic knowledge of this distinction results in the religious faith that Īśvara is omnipotent and the jīva is His eternal dāsa or servant. The supreme end of life lies in eternal service to God and to humanity. Dvaita ethics is founded on the Gītā distinction between the good and the wicked as described in the chapter called "Devāsura Vibhāga". Good is radically different from evil and therefore the good man differs from the evil-minded. The former chooses the way of godliness and is elected, but the latter are tāmasika jīvas who elect the way of sin and are hurled into eternal hell. The sāttvika as a devotee of God meditates on His eminence and holiness and dedicates himself to the service of God and godly-men in utter humility and even in mukti he enjoys the delight of serving God and the eternal in his own unique way.

Viśiṣṭādvaita reconciles the extremes of Dvaita and Advaita by its theory of the relation between Brahman and the jīva in terms of śarīrin and śarīra. The jīva is a prakāra or mode of Brahman and is also an eternal entity though not external to the Prakārin. It lives, moves and has its being in Brahman, is controlled by the redemptive will of Īśvara and exists for His satisfaction. Though monadic in substance, the jīva has infinite consciousness and all jīvas are ultimately alike in their attributive consciousness or jñāna. Owing to the confusions of avidyā, the limitations of karma and the adventures caused by viṣaya kāma, the jīva subjects itself to the ills of samsāra. When viṣaya kāma is transformed into Bhagavat kāma, the jīva sheds its egoism and thirsts for communion with God. Finally the self of sensibility is spiritualised and divinised by the alchemy of love and attains the immortal bliss of sāyujya. The true test of spirituality is service to God and to all jīvas and the best kind of service is self-donation to the Lord or śeṣī who is Himself the endeavour and the end. The theory of śarīrin and śarīra brings out the intimacy between Brahman and the ātman on account of the immanence of God in all jīvas and the equality of all jīvas, and affords the most inspiring motive for social and spiritual service. Externality does not promote intimacy and unity, as the inseparable relation of prakāra and prakārin does. Likewise identity consciousness or aikya offers no incentive to love and service. But Viśiṣṭādvaita affords an adequate reason for Brahmanisation and benevolence by its theory of avibhāga and karma as kainkarya. Brahman enters into the finite self in order to impart Its nature to it and infinitise its content. The mumukṣu, as the śeṣa, effaces himself in the service of the śeṣī and all jīvas. Thus, while Advaita equates Brahman with jñāna or pure consciousness and Dvaita stresses the omnipotence of God, Viśiṣṭādvaita defines God as Love and thus reconciles the extremes of Dvaita and Advaita.

Śaṅkara, Rāmānuja and Madhva are the recognised expositors of the philosophy of Vedānta whose quintessence is the Gītā. All of them expound the Gītā with the authority of immemorial and weighty tradition and intuitive insight. Though their methods of interpretation are divergent and often contradictory, they agree in certain essential points, especially in expounding Gītā ethics. The metaphysician who has his own ultimate views on the problems of Reality should become a mumukṣu to whom philosophy is not only a view but also a way of life and finally a seeker after Brahman. Existence and value go together and the chief proof of the existence of Brahman is the intuitive experience of Brahman as the home of all eternal values. True mumukṣutva consists in shedding egoism and renouncing worldliness and carnality by shifting the centre from the ego or 'I' to the 'Thou' that is the source of all existents and their inner Self and realising Him. God is the centre of finite life and therefore the jīva cannot be self-centred, but should gravitate towards God. The seeker after God is at last blessed with a soul sight of God and has Brahmadṛṣṭi and sees everything in God and God in everything. The realisation of Brahman may be regarded as the vertical ascent from the temporal to the eternal. Since spirituality and service go together, the vertical way of Brahmānubhava includes the horizontal method of benevolence. Intellectual illumination and ecstasy have their consummation in ethical exaltation which connotes the abandoning of the individualistic or exclusive outlook, and ceaseless service to all jīvas including even the sub-human world. Thus the vertical ascent to divine life is practically the same as the horizontal aspect of social and spiritual service. God above is God in man and nature, and spirituality and service are the two aspects of the same religious experience.

CHAPTER X

CONCLUSION

THE supreme value of the Gītā as the Divine Song is the note of harmony that it strikes in dealing with the fundamental problems of the philosophies of nature, spirit and God as indicated in the previous chapters. The three are inter-related and are not mutually exclusive, and therefore the Gītā is free from the defects of naturalism, monadism and absolutism. The philosophy of nature recognises in a realistic way the unity of prakṛti and its value as an environment for the evolving self. The Gītā philosophy of conduct follows the á priori road from prakṛti to puruṣa and Puruṣottama and then deduces the lower from the higher and takes its cue from the analysis of the chief factors of conduct, namely, adhiṣṭhāna or the bodily locus, kartā, the moral and spiritual agent, and daivam or divinity. Its metaphysic of morals utilises the philosophy of the embodied self as determined by prakṛti and its three guṇas, sattva, rajas and tamas. Its spiritual philosophy is an enquiry into the nature of the puruṣa or ātman and the means of realising it, and the moral theory is evolved from it. Religion has its support in psychology, ethics and the philosophy of the self and has its foundation in the ontology dealing with the nature of Brahman as the Absolute identified with the supra-personal Self or Puruṣottama. He is immanent in all and yet ethically eminent, and is the ultimate subject of moral and spiritual experience. In this way, the Gītā integrates human experience in all its levels and satisfies the logical test of coherence and all-comprehensiveness and the ethical and spiritual needs of human perfectability.

The Gītā idea of Puruṣottama as the supreme end of moral and spiritual endeavour is progressively realised by the three-fold *sādhana*s of Karma Yoga, Jñāna Yoga and Bhakti Yoga and defined by the three formulae of conduct, the moral, the spiritual and the religious. The first is the imperative of duty as a divine command or niṣkāma karma and is stated thus : “ Act only with the knowledge that your action is influenced by prakṛti and the interplay of its three guṇas.” The empirical self falsely identifies itself with prakṛti, and its conduct is conditioned by the guṇas. When this is realised, one acts according to the moral law which is not impelled by egoistic inclination or prudential calculation, but does one’s duty for duty’s sake in a disinterested way. It is freedom in action and not freedom from action and it remedies the defects of the ethics of hedonism and asceticism by synthesising sāṅkhya and yoga as the theory and practice

f moral life. It avoids the extremes of the contemplative and the active life. The second is a spiritual formula and is stated as follows: "Treat the world of living beings in thine own person and that of others as a puruṣa or spiritual personality and not as the product of prakṛti." This view gives positive meaning to the previous negative formula and expounds the way of self-realisation and its intrinsic value. The self or ātman has its own freedom, can make or mar its future and is therefore not the slave of fatalism or even of divine determinism. The end as self-realisation has also the advantage of bridging the chasm between egoism and altruism by the idea of the similarity of all jīvas in the sub-human, human and celestial kingdoms. The third formula marks the transition from spiritual philosophy to the philosophy of religion and it corrects the evils of subjectivism, which may follow from the second formula. It may be stated thus: "Regard all your actions as determined by Puruṣottama who is the inner Self of all beings." Work on the religious level becomes the worship of God and every thought as well as every word and deed is dedicated to God who is Himself the way and end of life and is thus consecrated. The will is in tune with the Infinite and the self is offered to its real Self. This is the highest stage of moral, spiritual and religious endeavour. As it shifts the centre of activity from the individualistic to the cosmic sphere, from puruṣa to Paramapuruṣa, it marks a revolution in conduct and frees the seeker after God from the perils of worldly life and samsāra. The three formulae of conduct are not really opposed, but are only different ways of expressing the same truth.

The three classical instances of yajña, dāna and tapas adduced by Vedānta as imperatives of duty are interpreted in the light of the three formulae in the ascending scale of values. Yajña is duty to the devas, dāna is duty to society and tapas is duty to the self and these three instances are typical cases of conduct and are fairly exhaustive. Niṣkāma karma is disinterested work without tāmasic slothfulness and rājasic self-glorification and from this standpoint, yajña is duty to cosmic gods from whom we derive our psycho-physical nature, without seeking any favour from them; dāna is the practice of benevolence without any thought of benefit and tapas is self-purification leading to purity of thought, word and deed and freedom from violence and the taint of sex. The second formula dealing with ātmāvalokana refers to the virtues of self-sacrifice, samatva and introversion. Yajña consists in the burning of the fleshly feeling in the fire of jñāna; dāna is the practice of samatva or the essential equality of all jīvas irrespective of their birth and status, and tapas is inwardness or ceaseless meditation on the self to realise its inner quiet. But it is the third formula that furnishes the highest motive to conduct from the religious standpoint. Yajña is Brahmārpaṇa and Brahmahavis and is self-offering to God who is immanent in all gods as their Inner Self. Dāna is beneficent activity to all jīvas as sons of God and tapas is the loving meditation on God as the source and centre of finite life. As Bhagavān is Himself the upāya and the upeya, the triple discipline consisting of spiritual, social and religious duties and virtues has no efficacy in itself as means to mukti without the grace of God. By absolute self-surrender to God, the mumukṣu seeks Him or is sought by Him, and is freed from ignorance and sinfulness. When religion develops into mysticism, sin means self-alienation from God who is Love and the mystic or jñānī pines and pants for reunion with the Beloved. Then the sensualised mind becomes spiritualised, lust becomes love and love deepens into longing for God and ultimately the lover and the Beloved become one and are lost in immortal bliss.

The essentials of the ethical philosophy of the Gītā as the gospel of redemptive love are summed up by Yāmūnācārya in his "Gītārtha Saṅgraha" and the eighteen chapters or Yogas are analysed into three ṣaṭkas of six chapters each. Yoga is the spiritual aspiration of the self or ātman for union with God or Paramātman and consists mainly of four stages known as karma, jñāna, bhakti and prapatti. They throw light on the path from sensuality to spirituality and from spirituality to divine life or bhakti. The first section defines the nature of Karma Yoga and Jñāna Yoga as the two wings of the ātman in its flight to the Alone or ātmāvalokana and points to self-realisation as the only means to God-realisation. The middle ṣaṭka extols bhakti as the supreme way to the knowledge of Brahman and the last describes the philosophy of prakṛti, puruṣa and Puruṣottama in detail, sums up the whole truth, and insists on absolute self-surrender to the Lord as the only way of redemption. The second chapter expounds the eternity of the ātman and the ethics of niṣkāma karma or disinterested action, and thus correlates sāṅkhyan knowledge and yogic conduct. The third chapter defines niṣkāma karma negatively as the result of the interaction of the guṇas of prakṛti and positively as consecrated service to Bhagavān or Sarveśvara. The fourth brings out the jñāna aspect of karma and reveals the true nature of avatāra or incarnation. The fifth stresses the ease and expeditiousness of Karma Yoga and the meaning of samadarśana of the pure self. The sixth chapter explains the nature of ātmāvalokana as the fulfilment of the two Yogas and the four classes of Yogīs and marks the transition from spiritual knowledge of parā vidyā or the knowledge of God. The middle ṣaṭka explains and extols the nature of Bhagavān as the Supreme Self, and Bhakti Yoga as the most efficacious means of knowing Him and attaining mukti. The seventh chapter classifies bhaktas into four types, namely, ārta, jijñāsu, aśvayārthī and jñānī or the man in affliction, the man who seeks the self, the man who seeks worldly goods and the wise man, and assigns the highest place to the jñānī who seeks God alone as his ātman and who is sought by God as His very life. The eighth chapter analyses the motives and ends of the different seekers of God. The ninth brings to light the transcendental character of the avatāra and the essentials of bhakti. The tenth expatiates on the infinity of perfections or kalyāṇa guṇas of Brahman with a view to awakening the true devotional consciousness of the bhakta. The eleventh describes with epic sublimity the cosmic glory or vibhūti of Bhagavān as experienced by Arjuna who was given the 'vision and faculty divine'. The twelfth chapter states the supreme value of bhakti, and indicates the diverse ways of practising it according to the psychological requirements of the adhikārī. The last ṣaṭka sums up the central aim of the Gītā and rounds off with the truth that absolute self-surrender is the one and only way to redemption. The thirteenth chapter distinguishes between the body as kṣetra or the field and the ātman as kṣetrajña or the dweller in the field, and points out the means of freeing oneself from the bondage of embodiment or samsāra. The fourteenth traces the cause of bondage to the egoism arising from interaction of the three guṇas with a view to securing the disillusionment of the ātman. The fifteenth chapter points to Puruṣottama as higher than the highest state of the jīva, known as the akṣara or freed self. The sixteenth defines the divine type of the jīva as the supreme seeker after Bhagavān as contrasted with the demoniac type who follows the way of wickedness and the seventeenth analyses the psychological distinctions of conduct as determined by the guṇas with a view to defining duty as a divine command. The last chapter insists on śaraṇāgati or self-surrender to the Lord as the supreme means of mokṣa and extols kaiṅkarya as the eternal value of karma.

The main topics in the eighteen chapters are further summarised by Vedānta Deśika as follows : The requirements in the disciple, the dispelling of his confusions, the necessity of Karma Yoga, its rational or jñāna aspect, the practice of Yoga, the greatness of the jñānī, the three kinds of devotees, Bhakti Yoga, the infinite glory of God, cosmic vision, the ladder of bhakti, the nature of the pure self or puruṣa, the analysis of prakṛti, the perfections of Puruṣottama, śāstra as the highest pramāṇa, the nature of duties and the quintessence of the whole teaching.

Hinduism, of all religions, reconciles the conflict between metaphysics and religion by affirming the identity of the Absolute, the all-inclusive whole, with the God of ethical religion who is the Saviour of all. It insists on the uniformity of the cosmic order, on the essential unity of all jīvas in spite of their psychological differences due to karma and on the possibility of every jīva regaining its divine heritage and enjoying for ever the bliss of union and communion. The Gītā is the cream of Hinduism as it distinguishes between the essentials of religion and the non-essentials which are merely substitutes and it satisfies the claims of universal religion. It proclaims the truths of the immanence of the God of Love in all beings and in all faiths, the spiritual kinship of all jīvas including those in the sub-human kingdom and the perfectability of every jīva in the process of Brahmanisation. Its social philosophy recognises the spiritual unity of all jīvas, but, at the same time, concedes the psychological truth that persons differ in their temperament and training owing to the influence of the three guṇas.

Individuals and communities have freedom to grow in their own way, but the evils of individualism and communalism should go. The evils of exclusiveness and hatred will be removed only when the ethical idea of righteousness or dharma replaces the political stress on the rights of man. The acts of duty may be determined by a man's station in life, inherited or chosen; but his inner attitude as defined by the Gītā is the same in all, as brought out fully in the story of Dharmavyādha. The Gītā teaching has also a profound influence on the problems of political philosophy, as it insists on a kingdom of spiritual ends in which each man is a person or ātman who has or can attain moral svarāj and not a thing to be used as a means to the selfish ends of exploiters and tyrants. Political autonomy can thrive only in a moral world where persuasion takes the place of compulsion and soul-power has sway over brute force. In an ideal state, wisdom, courage and temperance are well balanced in a just way and wisdom reigns over the other virtues. But such harmony does not mean the golden mean between the spiritual, human and animal sides of life. True harmony in the ethical sense implies moral and spiritual svarāj and the conquest of animality by spirituality. Political svarāj modelled on this plan on an international scale should give liberty to each man to realise his moral and spiritual ideals, concede the equality of all nations to rule themselves and recognise the unity of humanity and social solidarity. Politics is in practice built on expediency ; but, as a philosophy, it should be founded on the ideals of moral and spiritual excellence and ultimately on the faith of ethical religion that, when virtue is dethroned by vice, the Lord of righteousness incarnates into history to re-establish the reign of righteousness and redeem man from evil and evil-doers. The Gītā is the divine song of love. Nārāyaṇa and nara are inseparable. Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna are one and as nara represents universal man or the whole of humanity, the song is meant for the whole world. It is the call to the spirit of humanity to shed its ignorance and sinfulness and enjoy the hospitality of divine life and love. Sañjaya with his vision and faculty divine heard the song and lost himself in its rapture :

rājan samsmṛtya samsmṛtya
 samvādam idam adbhutam |
 keśavārjunayoḥ puṇyam
 hṛsyāmi ca muhur muhuḥ . |

—xviii. 76.

What was possible for one man is possible for all mankind. The voice of God is not merely the voice of duty or Vedāntic knowledge, but is the call of divine love. In the immortal words of Bhagavān :

 “Whoever with true devotion worships any deity, in him I deepen that devotion and he ultimately reaches me.”

yo yo yām yām tanum bhaktaḥ
 śraddhayārcitum icchati
 tasya tasyācalām śraddhām
 tām eva vidadhāmyaham

—vii. 21.

and “Even those who worship other divinities worship me.”

ye (a) pyanyadevatābhaktāḥ |
 yajante śraddhayānvitāḥ |
 te (a) pi mām eva kaunteya
 yajantyavidhipūrvakam ||

—ix. 23.

INDEX

- Absolute 4, 26, 113, 124
 Absolutism 149
 Advaita 142, 146
 Adhikāri 156
 Ahaṅkāra 58, 89, 103, 115, 127
 Ahimsa 86, 116, 139
 Akṣara 32
 Allegory 5
 Arjuna 3, 27, 64, 73, 101, 155, 159
 Aristotle 43
 Āśvattha tree 26
 Aurobindo Ghosh 141
 Avatāra 4, 97
 Avidyā 38, 53, 77 103, 116, 123
 Avyavasāyātmikā buddhi 55
 Ācāryas 5
 Ātmakāma 56
 Ātman 3, 37, 46, 73, 76, 93, 149
 Ātmāvalokana 80, 93, 155

 Bergson 27
 Bhakti 105, 130
 Bhakti Yoga 8, 105, 140
 Bhedābheda 142
 Brahman 1, 40, 94
 Buddhi 13, 26, 53, 73
 Buddhism 9, 29, 137

 Cārṇvāka 10, 15
 Christian asceticism 34
 Christian ethics 123

 Darśana 1
 Dayā 118, 127
 Dāna 67, 71, 101, 152
 Detachment 79
 Dharmakṣetra 101
 Dharmavyādha 158
 Dualism 75, 126
 Duty 60, 100
 Dvaita 141
 Dvandvas 85

 Ethics 1, 6, 9, 24, 28, 149
 European thought 9, 17
 Evil 121
 Evolutionary theory 5, 112

 Food 25, 44
 Freedom 12, 76, 100, 150

 Garbe 30
 Gītā 2
 Gītārta Saṅgraha 153
 God 1, 6, 11, 124, 148
 Grace 129
 Guṇas 23, 42, 119, 157
 Guru 67

 Hedonism 17, 33, 60, 128
 Historical method 4
 Humanism 137

 Infinite 6, 27
 Intuition 1, 81
 Īśvara 7, 64, 95

- James 41
 Janaka 63
 Jīva 38, 103, 119
 Jñāna Yoga 8, 57, 75, 81, 93, 105, 140, 149
 Jñānī 82, 107, 119, 133, 155

 Kāmya Karma 50, 57
 Kaiṅkarya 100
 Kaivalya 88, 104, 116, 120
 Kant 9, 32, 50, 92, 123
 Karma 3, 12, 29, 40, 50, 57,
 65, 103, 117
 Karmaphalatyāga 63
 Karma Yoga 8, 63, 75, 93,
 105, 122, 136, 140
 Karma Yogin 64
 Kṛpā 110, 126
 Kṛṣṇa 3, 26, 97, 110, 134, 159
 Kṣatriya 73, 101, 140
 Kṣetra 49, 111, 156
 Kṣetrajña 49, 111, 156
 Kurukṣetra 3

 Madhva 138, 145
 Manas 13
 Māyā 99
 Mentalist 81
 Metaphysics 1, 9
 Mokṣa 3
 Monadism 149
 Mukti 57, 79, 124, 130, 143
 Mysticism 133

 Naturalism 149
 Nirvāṇa 29, 87
 Niṣkāma karma 50, 65

 Pantheism 3
 Parabrahmam 3
 Parāvidyā 94
 Personal God 4
 Personality 102
 Philosophy 1, 6
 Philosophy of Religion 1, 94
 Prakāra 146
 Prakṛti 42, 48, 53, 80, 99,
 111, 141, 149
 Prāṇāyāma 27
 Prapatti 108, 130
 Prasthānas 5
 Problem of conduct 9
 Progress 113
 Psychology 40
 Psychology of conduct 13, 36
 Puruṣa 32, 48, 53, 80, 99,
 111, 141, 149
 Puruṣottama 4, 92, 111, 141, 149
 Pūrva Mīmāṃsā 10, 20

 Quietism 5

 Rāmānuja 138
 Reason 18, 59, 93
 Rebirth 40
 Redemption 2, 126, 130
 Religion 1, 10, 36, 149
 Religious consciousness 7
 Renunciation 84
 Ritualistic theory 22

 Śāktaism 142
 Śaṅkara 138
 Sāṅkhya 9, 29, 56, 68
 Sāṅkhya buddhi 55
 Śāstras 6

- Satyāgraha 138
 Self-determination 13, 77, 114
 Self-realisation 77, 116
 Self-surrender 156
 Service 136
 Social Philosophy 157
 Soul culture 83, 117
 Spirituality 136
 Śrṣṭi—Pralaya 95, 119
 Śruti 2
 Stoicism 29, 33
 Subjectivism 5
 Sūkṣma Śarīra 37
summum bonum 29, 136
 Supreme self 12
 Svarāj 158
 Synthetic character 14

 Tapas 67, 70, 86, 152
 Teleology 118
 Theism 3, 5
 Tilak School 139
 Truth 4

 Upaniṣads 2, 7, 32, 44
 Vaikuṇṭha 3, 97
 Vairāgya 81, 116
 Vaiṣṇavite schools 132
 Vāsanā 62, 79
 Vāsudeva 3
 Vedānta 1, 16, 32
 Vedānta Sūtras 2
 Vedāntic good 23
 Vedic good 23
 Viśaya Kāma 56
 Viśiṣṭādvaita 141, 147
 Viṣṇu 97
 Viveka 81
 Voluntary action 36
 Vyavasāyātmikā buddhi 55

 Warfare 139

 Yajña 67, 152
 Yājñavalkya 5
 Yāmunā 153
 Yoga 3, 8, 27, 32, 66, 154
 Yogin 75

